Convocation begins Thursday; statistics released on graduates

Although there are only 33 more men graduating than women next week, the gender ratio varies significantly in some of the schools.

The Office of Admissions and Records has released the "Highlights of the April 2000 Graduating Class." These are the estimated statistics for graduates in April 2000.

Of the 4,213 graduates in April, 50.4 percent are men and 49.6 percent are women.

In the David O. McKay School of Education, of the 301 graduates 279 are women. While in the college of Engineering and Technology, of the 289 graduates 262 are men. The college with the most evenly divided graduating class is Biology and Agriculture with 167 male graduates and 153 female graduates.

Julie Adamson, a BYU student graduating in audiology and speech-language pathology in the school of education, said the lack of men in her major is discouraging.

"It's not as fun when you don't get to meet any guys," Adamson said. "Of the five guys in my class, four are married, and the single guy is too short."

Family, Home and Social Sciences has the largest number of graduates with 772. The college of Humanities is second with 444, and the Marriott School of Management is third with 433.

Krissy Swallow, graduating in family science, is excited to graduate but said she expects her graduation to take "forever."

The youngest graduate of April 2000 is 18-year-old William Arthur Taysom, who is graduating in mathematics.

The average GPA for baccalaureate degrees is 3.42.

Of the 4,213 degrees for April 2000, there are 3,567 bachelor's degrees, 503 master's degrees, and 143 doctorates.

The report also gave statistics on which states produced the most graduates. Utah has the highest amount with 25.9 percent of the graduating class, while California comes in second with 15.1 percent and Idaho was third with 6.6 percent.

Graduates are from 49 states, two territories and 48 foreign countries.

Commencement exercises will begin on April 20, at 4 p.m. in the

LDS murder case may be re-opened

By Tiffany Gee and Seth Lewis
Tiffany@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

After 25 years, a case involving the murder of two missionaries for the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in Austin, Texas, may be reopened.

In 1975, Robert Elmer Kleasen, now 67, was convicted for the murder of Elder Mark Fischer, 19, serving in Austin.

Fischer and his companion, Gary Darly, 20, had gone to dinner Oct. 28, 1974, at Kleasen's trailer home behind a rendering plant west of Austin, according to the Associated Press.

Austin 1st Ward bishop Frank McCullough had warned the missionaries of visiting Kleasen, a less-active member.

"Bishop McCullough had instructed them not to go back and see him," said Darryl Townsend, then a member of the neighboring ward.

"They had been trying to fellowship and reactivate him. They decided to go back one more time. They weren't seen again."

When investigators searched the house, they found Fischer's bloody wristwatch and his missionary tag with a bullet hole through it, according to the AP.

Police suspect Kleasen disposed of the bodies at the rendering plant, the AP reported.

At the advice of one local sheriff, church members from around the state joined in searches, each walking two-mile stretches of local highways for clues.

> "We are making an initial assessment. If we determine we can have a retrial, we would proceed to court."
> — Rosemary Lehmberg, first assistant district attorney in Travis County

"There was a lot of emotion," Townsend said. "It was a daily thing: 'Have they found anything today?'"

Kleasen was sentenced to die, but a Texas Court of Criminal Appeals ruled the search warrant insufficient, said Rosemary Lehmberg, first assistant district attorney for the district attorney's office in Travis County.

Kleasen was released and the case closed — leaving some church members confused.

"It was such a stupid thing that let him off in the first place," Townsend said.

"The evidence they had on him was incredible."

Travis County officials are considering reopening the case after Kleasen recently resurfaced in England, where he was arrested for breaching a bail agreement, the AP reported.

"I would be delighted to have it reopened if they could convict him," Townsend said.

With forensic science's more sophisticated technology, things such as DNA testing may be used in a retrial, Lehmberg said.

"We are doing a legal review of the entire matter," Lehmberg said.

"We have to review what is available in terms of physical evidence and in terms of legal evidence."

A problem with cases more than 25 years old is that some of the witnesses will not be available, Lehmberg said.

However, sometimes in a retrial, past testimonies can be used, she said.

"We are making an initial assessment," Lehmberg said.

"If we determine we can have a retrial, we would proceed to court. Then there's just the matter of retrieving him from England."

Elian still in U.S. as another deadline passes

Associated Press

MIAMI — Elian Gonzalez's great-uncle defied the government Thursday and the government blinked, letting its deadline to collect the boy pass and agreeing to a delay that averts a law-enforcement showdown for now. In Little Havana, thousands cheered wildly at the news.

Attorneys for Elian's Miami relatives claimed victory after a federal appeals court issued a stay blocking anyone from taking the boy out of the country. The Justice Department, though, said it had agreed to a delay of "three or four days."

The 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals told the government to respond to the stay by 9:30 a.m. Friday, giving great-uncle Lazaro Gonzalez's family another day with Elian at the very least. Lazaro "feels relief," family spokesman Armando Gutierrez said, "at least until tomorrow morning."

Thursday's court action capped a fluid, electrifying day that began minutes after Lazaro Gonzalez dared the government to take Elian by force.

In less than 24 hours, the Miami relatives met with Attorney General Janet Reno, publicly announced their defiance of her, allowed Elian to speak on TV and ignored a 2 p.m. deadline to deliver him to an airport for return to his father.

Since January, Reno and the government have repeatedly extended the deadline for Lazaro Gonzalez to surrender the boy despite a standing order to do so. And this week, the nation's top law officer took the extraordinary step of flying down herself in a chartered plane to hammer out a settlement.

Attorneys for Elian's father, Juan Miguel Gonzalez, said the Miami relatives had, with their actions Thursday, "emotionally damaged and exploited this most wonderful little boy."

"Today, Lazaro Gonzalez defied the nation's chief law enforcement officers and publicly and belligerently refused to turn Elian over to his father," said Gregory Craig, Juan Miguel Gonzalez's attorney. "Today, Lazaro Gonzalez broke the law."

Outside Lazaro Gonzalez's house in Little Havana, a throng several thousand strong massed to protest and, though it would prove unnecessary, protect. "War! War! War!" some shouted in Spanish. Others renewed pledges of nonviolence.

"While this child remains in this house, there is hope," Miami-Dade Mayor Alex Penelas said. "We are living very tense moments, perhaps the most tense in the last 25 years."

The stay issued by the 11th Circuit does not specifically prevent the government from transferring Elian to his father. But a Justice official, requesting anonymity, said the government gave its word that it wouldn't. The stay was issued while the 11th Circuit decides whether to hear a full appeal of the relatives' claims.

Earlier Thursday, Reno, who was roundly criticized for how the government responded to the Branch Davidians in 1993, said her department would act in a "reasonable, measured way."

"We have the authority to take action," Reno said. "But responsible authority means not only knowing when to take action, but how and when to take that action."

After failing to reach an agreement with the family Wednesday during a dramatic 2 1/2-hour meeting attended by Elian, Reno ordered them to bring him to Opa-locka airport outside Miami-at 2 p.m. Thursday.

Her plan called for a plane to take Elian, and any Miami relatives who wanted to come, to Washington for a retreat at a neutral site with the boy's father. No Cuban diplomats would be present. After the meeting, the government said, the father would take custody of Elian.

Elian was reported in good spirits.

Opposition in S. Korea retains plurality

SEOUL, South Korea — The opposition retained a plurality in parliamentary elections Thursday despite ruling camp hopes that plans for a summit with rival North Korea would boost President Kim Dae-jung.

The opposition Grand National Party, or GNP, which has long accused Kim of being too soft on communist North Korea, retained the biggest bloc in the 273-seat parliament in a tight race.

The GNP won 105 seats and Kim's Millennium Democratic Party, or MDP, won 94 seats, KBS television reported, citing election returns.

In a direct voting system, the two parties were vying for five other seats whose votes had not yet been tallied. Other parties and independents shared 23 seats. The results of 46 seats decided in a proportional voting systems had yet to be released, but the outcome was not expected to affect the opposition's plurality.

Clinton claims no interest in pardon

WASHINGTON — President Clinton heatedly said Thursday "I'm not ashamed" about being impeached and "I'm not interested" in being pardoned for any alleged crimes in the Monica Lewinsky scandal and Whitewater investigation.

But Clinton did not say whether he would accept a pardon if it were offered by his successor. Republicans immediately pounced on his failure to answer the question.

"The answer is I have no interest in it. I wouldn't ask for it. I don't think it would be necessary," the president told the convention of the American Society of Newspaper Editors. "I am prepared to stand before any bar of justice I have to stand before."

Clinton's appearance brought forth his most emotional outpouring yet about the impact of the sex-and-lies Lewinsky case. "I've paid quite a lot," he said. "I struggled very hard to save my relationship with my wife and my daughter ... I made a terrible mistake of which I am deeply regretful."

Testimony for Cook's civil case ends

SALT LAKE CITY — Testimony ended Thursday in a civil case against U.S. Rep. Merrill Cook for leaving $193,992 in disputed campaign bills after his winning 1996 race for Congress.

Witnesses for Ron Nielson, a political consultant suing Cook for the money, tried to rebut Cook's claim he did most of his own fund raising.

Cook, two former campaign aides testified, made a lackluster effort to raise money, leaving it to professionals.

"It was tough to get him to make calls," said Kevin Walthers, who was hired by the Nielson firm to manage Cook's 1996 campaign.

"He was always distracted by something else. When he did make the calls, he would never say, 'I need your financial support.'"

Cook dialed up donors only two or three times during 90-minute call sessions, said Kelly Casaday, his chief 1996 fund raiser.

AP poll: Public hesitates to file online

WASHINGTON — More than a third of the American public has doubts about the security of filing tax returns electronically, despite government encouragement of this growing practice, an Associated Press poll finds.

The doubters range from people like 71-year-old Jack Hurst of Los Angeles who says he doesn't know anything about the Internet to 48-year-old Gerhardt Kasper of south Florida who says he knows too much.

The poll, conducted for The AP by ICR of Media, Pa., found 57 percent say they wouldn't worry about the privacy of their financial information when filing online, while 36 percent say they would worry.

"I like to put it down on paper," said Hurst, who is semi-retired and does not own a computer. "I don't like to have it floating around in the air."

Kasper, manager of a service company who lives in Delray Beach, Fla., said he isn't convinced that the Internet "is a secure platform."

SCRIPTURE OF THE DAY

"The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God. And if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together."

— Omni 1:26

Paul Deode, 22, a sophomore from Gilmer, Texas, majoring in international law and diplomacy, likes this scripture because, "once we realize we're literally children of God, it changes the way we act and the daily activity of our life."

Provo Fight Club raises legal questions

By Rob Rogers
rob@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Associate City Editor

Editor's note: Names of Fight Club members have not been used. Instead, they have been identified by their fight club names.

Jack R. Peterson/Pr

Two Fight Club members duke it out at night. Provo Fight Club has provoked a numbe tions from both sides on how to handle the violence issue.

Provo's Fight Club is raising a lot of questions.

It raises questions because there is no specific law that makes the fighting illegal.

It raises questions because the fighters could be held liable if someone is injured or killed.

It raises questions because it may not be the most morally-sound activity to participate in.

Just like in a good episode of "Law and Order," police enforce the laws and city attorneys prosecute the offenders.

The police can break up the activity on grounds of disorderly conduct. They can issue citations on the same grounds.

The citation or police record would be passed on to the city attorney's office and the city attorney would then decide whether or not to prosecute.

"I don't know that what they're doing runs contrary to existing laws," said City Attorney Rick Romney. "However, they don't have carte blanche."

Romney said police decide to issue the citations, and according to the facts the city attorney will decide whether to prosecute. If they feel there is sufficient evidence that a law has been broken, they will prosecute the offenders.

That leaves police officers to decide whether or not the fighters are participating in illegal behavior. Provo police have yet to issue tickets to the fighters.

Citing the laws regarding disorderly conduct and having permits for sporting events, Sgt. Mark Troxel of the Provo Police Department said the fight club was illegal and dangerous.

"Things like this can lead to other illegal acts," Troxel said. "People start putting money on fights, soon they start rigging the fights. There's a myriad of problems here."

The club leaders and founders have spoken out on the legality issue as well.

"We appreciate the work of the Provo police. It's nice to see our tax dollars at work. We acknowledge the police offers to cooperate with us and guide us so we can continue to operate Fight Club within the constraints of the law," said Fight Club founder, Black Avenger.

However founders see things their own point of view. "Fight Club isn't about violence. It's more like a picnic where friends gather, but instead of enjoying a main course of ham and swiss on rye, they come to enjoy a feast of testosterone, sweat and tears," Black Avenger said.

As far as BYU policy goes on students getting involved in Fight Club, BYU's spokeswoman Carri Jenkins said the university discourages any high-risk behavior.

Steve Baker, director of the Honor Code Office did not have a comment on the rectitude of the Fight Club's activities, but said if it were to become a legal issue with the city, they w with it as such.

But the Fight Club don't see their activiti gal, or even dangerous.

"I don't know why are so concerned. everyday — the only is they don't have an Black Avenger said.

"We just want to help avenues to release ener breaking the law," s Club member Johann.

However police aren that way.

"If we find the peopl ... we will prosecute them," Sgt. Troxel said bors shouldn't have with this."

unterfeit circulation is ging at $80,000, said andall, resident agent of ake City Secret Service. not alarming. What is s that it was doubled in s," Crandall said.

essibility of scanning and printing equipment makes large quantities of counterfeit bills easier to produce, he said.

"It gets scanned on laptops, copied, but you still can't do a good replica," Crandall said.

Each bill has features — the portrait, lettering and script — that is the work of a separate engraver and produced on a geometric lathe which makes an exact replica impossible, Crandall said.

The bills also contain a watermark, a vertical security thread through the bill and color shifting ink where a number looks green when viewed straight on, but black when seen at an angle.

Lt. Doug Edwards, public affairs officers for Orem police, said he's had a total of six counterfeit bills in the last year.

"I've seen some good bills over the years and some are obvious," he said.

These counterfeit bills are usually caught at the bank when deposited for the first time, said Paul Morley, Federal Reserve Coordinator of Public Information.

"Once in awhile the currency will make it through the merchants, banks, and get to the Federal Reserve," he said.

The bills then are destroyed.

Crandall said most counterfeit leaks into society at convenience stores through inexperienced tellers and rushed lines.

One reason is the new bills look a lot different from what people are used to, Crandall said.

"People are still uncomfortable with the new money. It looks like monopoly money," he said.

There is no insurance with counterfeit. The businesses lose and the difference comes from their pockets, Crandall said.

Banks are reimbursed for the loss in counterfeit money by the Federal Reserve, Morley said.

Counterfeit is turned over daily to the Secret Service, he said.

The Secret Service was established in 1863 with the purpose of stopping counterfeiting.

At the time, counterfeit was circulated so extensively that the government created enforcement measures just to stop it, Crandall said.

s affiliation and divorce rates are related, according t study by the Barna Research Group. Protestants the same rate as the national average, while Baptists divorce at a slightly higher rate. Catholics divorce at lower rate than average, the study reported.

LDS Church members divorce at roughly the same national average, but only about 6 percent of LDS rriages fail, BYU professor Daniel Judd said. The 6 gure comes from a survey of 7,000 LDS Church

The Times listed many reasons for the higher survival rate of temple marriages, including marriage within the same faith and an unusual level of commitment to the marriage.

"The research raises questions about the effectiveness of how churches minister to families," said George Barna of the Barna Research Group.

"The high incidence of divorce within the Christian community challenges the idea that churches provide truly practical and life-changing support for marriages," Barna said.

According to the Times report, the LDS Church provides several tools to support marriage.

First, LDS Church members serve missions, which helps them get accustomed to living with another person. Second, the church sends representatives – home teachers — to visit members monthly in their homes, and families in trouble receive counsel from local leaders.

JonBenet's parents stall lie test

Associated Press

BOULDER, Colo. — A plan for JonBenet Ramsey's parents to take a lie detector test has faltered because of additional demands set by their lawyer, police say.

Police Chief Mark Beckner said the Ramseys' lawyer had laid out "additional conditions" after Boulder police and prosecutors agreed to the Ramseys' offer to take the test.

However, the attorney for John and Patsy Ramsey denied making additional demands and accused police of unreasonably insisting that the FBI conduct the polygraph test.

The Ramseys had requested an independent party conduct the test; they do not consider the FBI independent because they helped Boulder police investigate the JonBenet slaying.

"I do not think it is fair for you to demand that the examination must only be conducted by an organization that has worked with your department's investigation," attorney L. Lin Wood said in a letter to Beckner. A copy of the letter was faxed to The Associated Press.

Six-year-old JonBenet was found beaten and strangled in the basement of her parents' upscale Boulder home on Dec. 26, 1996. No suspects have been named but Boulder police have said the parents remain under "an umbrella of suspicion."

The Ramseys volunteered to take a polygraph test during television interviews last month. Tuesday, Beckner said in a letter to Wood that police would meet the Ramseys' conditions for taking a lie-detector test.

Beijing protester arrested, beaten

Associated Press

BEIJING — At least 200 members of the banned Falun Gong group were arrested Thursday during a protest of official efforts to destroy the meditation movement, a human rights group said.

Protesters in and around Tiananmen Square unfurled Falun Gong banners, and police quickly arrested them, beating some, the Hong Kong-based Information Center for Human Rights and Democratic Movement in China said.

Reporters near the square saw police pushing people into two vans and driving them away.

Spokesman for Beijing police and the Ministry of Public Security said they did not know anything about the protest.

The Falun Gong members were protesting official efforts to prevent them from marking the first anniversary of a demonstration that led to a crackdown on the group, the Information Center said.

Uniforms in school lower violence in Calif.

By Julie Howard

In an era of rising concern over public school violence, parents, school boards and administrators are recommending school uniforms among other measures to increase school safety.

Mandatory school uniforms have paid off for Long Beach Unified School District in California, with a 76 percent reduction in school violence since 1994, said Richard VanDerlaan, information officer for the school district.

The Long Beach community experienced a 25 percent reduction in violence during the same time period, he said.

For the 1998-99 school year, Long Beach schools also reported the lowest rate of student absences in 20 years, as well as the lowest rate of school dropouts and suspensions for misconduct in 10 years, VanDerlaan said.

These improvements came without any changes in discipline codes or increased security, he said. In fact, the district was able to decrease security staffing during the past six years.

Uniforms help students come to school ready for the business of learning, VanDerlaan said.

"There are those who say kids learn just as well in frayed, cut-off jeans, or looking like Halloween," he said. "Maybe that's true for some students, but for others, it (clothing) can be very disruptive."

Parents, students and teachers were initially concerned that uniforms would limit students' freedom of expression and creativity, but students are actually freer to express individual interests without the stress of choosing designer clothing, VanDerlaan said.

Long Beach students are part of a growing trend toward uniforms in public schools, according to a 1998 survey conducted by the National Association of Elementary School Principals.

More than one-quarter of elementary and middle school students in 10 American states attend a public school where uniforms are being worn or are under consideration, according to the survey.

And, schools have incentives to adopt uniform policies, since schools using uniforms reports increases in classroom discipline, school safety and student achievement.

Although uniforms tend to help students and teachers feel safer, research has not directly linked use of school uniforms with a reduction in school violence, said James Fiscus, editor at the National Resource Center for Safe Schools.

Instead of looking to one factor to decrease school violence, schools need an overall school safety plan created in cooperation with school, parent, and community groups, Fiscus said.

Ideally, these groups should meet to define problems within the schools, and then work to tailor solutions to specific problems the school faces, he said.

If gangs are a major factor in violence for a school or district, school uniforms could help by reducing gang identification, he said. However, it's not a cookie-cutter approach that will work for every school.

Safe school strategies must be founded in safe families and safe communities, said Becky Fleischauer, spokesperson for the National Education Association.

Each child needs a significant adult in his or her life, she said.

An available adult for every child goes a long way toward decreasing violence, Fleischauer said.

"A lot of times, we go to a physical solution like school uniforms, rather than a human solution," she said.

Anniversary is backdrop of proposed gun control bill

By Lindsay Palmer

In the year since the Columbine High School tragedy in Littleton, Colo., Americans have channeled their outrage and grief into working to prevent another school tragedy from happening again.

Federal and state government officials, private organizations, schools and presidential candidates have all reacted in one way or another to the Columbine tragedy.

Sen. Jack Reed, D-R.I., proposed a Juvenile Justice Bill and urged Congressional action before the April 20 anniversary of the killings at Columbine.

The bill would require all handguns to be sold with child safety locks, background checks at gun shows and a ban on juvenile possession of semiautomatic assault weapons.

"The measure is designed to keep dangerous weapons out of the hands of juveniles and criminals," Reed said. "The fact that House and Senate members have allowed this bill to sit idle in conference for almost a year in the wake of the Columbine High School massacre, and the numerous subsequent incidents, is disgraceful."

The bill has been locked up in a conference committee between the Senate and the House of Representatives, which each passed different versions.

Greg McCarthy, spokesperson for Sen. Reed, said the Senate called for a 72-hour waiting period on background checks at gun shows, while the House called for 24 hours.

Reed said the conference was adjourned Thursday, and it is very unlikely that there will be a resolution before the April 20 cut-off date.

"There will just be a lot of pious rhetoric on April 20," Reed said. "Nothing will come in a timely fashion, but we're hoping that the public concern will eventually prompt action."

Reed said the House and Senate seem to be in a "headlock" by the NRA.

"But we're seeing a lot of the necessary legislation being passed at the state level," he said.

Reed pointed to the stricter gun safety regulations passed earlier this month in Massachusetts and Maryland.

Dick Wadhams, press secretary for Colorado Gov. Bill Owen, said a lot of good legislation has also passed in Colorado since the Columbine tragedy.

Wadhams said he thinks the most important piece of legislation passed will change the agency used for background checks from the FBI to the Colorado Bureau of Investigation.

"The FBI system was not picking up restraining orders, which was a big problem," Wadhams said.

He said the agency will clear 95 percent of the gun sales in Colorado. The remaining 5 percent are private sales in gun shows.

Wadhams said other legislation will require the inclusion of juvenile records in background checks for firearm purchases. He said the Legislature is also on the verge of passing a bill that would ban "straw purchases" — buying guns for someone else who is ineligible to buy them — at gun shows.

There has been high concern about gun shows. It was a show where someone purchased the weapons used by the killers at Columbine.

President Bill Clinton brought national attention to the "gun show loophole" when he visited Denver on Wednesday to show his support for Colorado legislation that would close the loophole.

However, Wadhams said the legislation, which would require background checks for firearm purchases at gun shows, was stopped by the Colorado legislature.

It has now been placed as an initiative on the November ballot for approval. Wadhams said polls show the initiative has the support of more than 70 percent of Colorado voters.

The Columbine tragedy has also spurred legislative action in Utah, including a bill that will require school districts to put together school safety plans by July 1.

Reed Richards, chief deputy in the Utah Attorney General's office, said Utah's zero-tolerance policy, giving immediate suspensions to kids who take school, is strongly enfor

Police break up Jamaican-led marijuana ring

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Making dozens of arrests, federal drug agents on Thursday broke up a Jamaican-led narcotics ring which employed bribed FedEx drivers in a scheme to distribute 170 tons of Mexican marijuana to East coast markets.

Announcing the arrests at a news conference, the Drug Enforcement administration said the 18-month investigation which uncovered the operation was conducted with the full cooperation of FedEx's top officials.

DEA agents said that arrests began shortly after midnight Thursday and that by midday there had been 41 arrests, 19 of them FedEx employees. They said the arresting officers also seized two tons of marijuana in west-coast warehouses, one under control of the Mexican group and another controlled by the Jamaican traffickers. They also seized 18 firearms and more than $4 million in cash and assets.

Over the entire period of the investigation there have been 98 arrests, agents said.

...ieldtrips and after-school activ...s were rare in the 1920s, she ...d. Emphasis was placed on ...ding and arithmetic instead.

Pickett said teachers were respected, almost feared, and discipline problems did not happen. Students did not even have an official dress code, she said.

"Dress standards were never brought up. Everyone just knew what they were supposed to wear," she said.

Boys wore overalls, and girls were expected to wear knee-length dresses, she said. If the length of a girl's skirt was questioned, she was sent to the principal and made to kneel on the floor. If it didn't touch the floor, they had to go home and change.

The dress code was introduced in the 1960s. Connie Holdaway was going to school in the Provo/Orem area at that time.

The Beatles had become popular and girls started to wear mini skirts and dresses with spaghetti straps, Holdaway said. After that students had to follow the dress code.

"Girls had to wear dresses and nylons, and boys just had to be cleaned up," she said.

Discipline problems were few and far between, she said, but the troublemakers were easy to spot. They were called hoods and there was only a handful of them. They smoked in the parking lot and mouthed off to the teachers, Holdaway said.

Most of the students respected the teachers and the rules, including the rule that prohibited holding hands with a member of the opposite sex in the hall, she said.

Even though schools were changing, one thing remained constant. The principal still led the school in prayer.

"We heard the prayer on the loudspeaker every morning, elementary school to high school, and it was just taken for granted," Holdaway said.

Students of the early Utah schools would hardly recognize schools today.

Praying in school is a legal issue and never happens now, said Juliana Montgomery. Montgomery attended schools in Orem during the 1980s and '90s.

"The only rule about dress standards in the 1990s is that students could not wear really, really short shorts," she said.

Rules seemed pretty lenient and people could wear pretty much whatever they wanted, she said.

Teachers have to face problems they couldn't have guessed they would have to, Montgomery said.

The most common cause for discipline involved students skipping class, but gang activity and drugs were also an issue, she said. Students started to show less respect for authority and for the basic rules, she said. But teachers continued to do their best to make the classroom conducive to learning.

"Despite rising problems with major issues, like guns and gangs, people still have high respect for teachers. It has become less fashionable to show it, though."

Committee votes to ban college sports gambling

...ociated Press

...ASHINGTON — A Senate committee ...ed Thursday to ban betting on college sports ... a practice legal only in Nevada — but ...elined a challenge from a Nevada senator to ...a nationwide minimum gambling age of 21.

...Sen. Richard Bryan, D-Nev., accused his ...leagues on the Senate Commerce Committ... of hypocrisy on the issue of gambling by ...ung people. He suggested they were interest... only in "trying to give Nevada the shaft."

The legislation would outlaw betting on Olympic, college or high school athletic events. Though there is little legal betting on the Olympics and none on high school sports, Nevada's gambling industry accepts bets on college sporting events that do not involve a school in the state.

The Nevada gambling industry took in $2.3 billion in sports wagers in fiscal 1999, with 30 percent to 40 percent bet on college sports.

Despite recent requests by the National Hockey League, National Basketball Association, National Football League and Major League Baseball to extend the proposed ban to professional sports, the committee focused solely on amateur events.

"Legalized gambling on kids is wrong," said Commerce Chairman John McCain, R-Ariz. "They should not be reduced to a point spread and a spectacle for wagering."

Supporters of the amateur sports betting ban said it would help in the broader fight against illegal gambling on college campuses. Bryan said the ban "will have absolutely no impact at all" because 99 percent of gambling on college sports occurs illegally on college campuses, not legally in Nevada casinos.

SCAMP committee looks ahead to future

Calendar laid out for six months

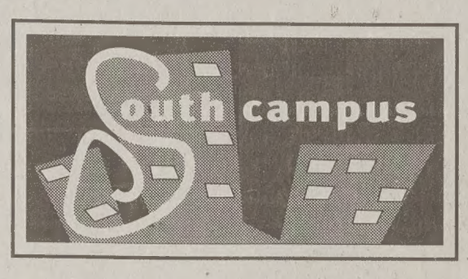
When the Provo Municipal Council placed a moratorium on approximately 50 blocks south of BYU campus Feb. 15, they gave themselves six months to foster the development of the South Campus Area Master Plan.

The committee assigned to the project has until Aug. 15 to agree on and receive city approval for zoning changes that will allow the development of high-density housing from University Avenue to 900 East and 800 North to 500 North.

Two weeks ago, John Fregonese, the planning consultant hired by the City of Provo to guide the development of the master plan, met with the SCAMP committee for the first time.



He presented a timeline for the plan and showed members of the committee various pictures of the kind of structures they may want to see in the SCAMP area.

Fregonese said the committee needs to gain an overall vision of the project before it gets bogged down in the details.

"It's important to engage in wishful thinking, then be practical," he said.

Fregonese said although there is a lot of work to do in a short amount of time, the committee can meet its goals with good planning.

The tentative schedule follows:

• April 27: Preparation for workshop.

• May 3-4: Workshop, which includes the unfolding of a sketch-plan of the area. Residents are welcome to give feedback on the sketch.

• May 23: Review workshop, present early draft plan and discuss feasibility of redevelopment and parking.

• May 30: Deliver draft code changes to the city.

• June 6: Committee approval of preferred plan and code changes.

• June 28: Present plan to planning commission.

• July 13: Present plan to Provo Municipal Council.

• Aug. 1: Tentative council adoption of plan and codes.

The committee meetings, open to the public, are at East Bay Golf Course, 1860 South East Bay Blvd. in Provo, at 4 p.m.

People caught up in the fervor of the proposed student village south of campus got a dose of reality Thursday.

Toward the end of the SCAMP committee meeting at the East Bay Golf Course, discussion centered on one key question: will property owners south of campus be willing to sell their property?

If owners aren't willing to sell their land to developers, the goal of the committee — to provide the zoning changes necessary to build the village — will be frustrated.

"It's a bold move by the mayor to call together a committee like this," said committee member Don Gurney, a land appraiser. "It is possible that this will all be for naught and we will have just spun our wheels."

Several local developers spoke up in agreement.

Devin Durrant, who owns five student apartment complexes, said there is no way owners will want to sell.

"We're assuming that everyone's going to want to sell their land and develop, but it's not going to happen," he said. "Very few people are willing to sell their property."

Durrant, who received approving gestures from the other property owners, said long-time residents do not want to move, no matter how high the price, and current apartment owners are not willing to pay the capital gains tax associated with sale of property.

"I talk to people who say they would love to sell, but the tax consequence is too great," he said.

Gurney said things may eventually change.

"These people who aren't willing to sell today may be anxious to sell when someone dies or something," he said. "This is a long-term project."

But Durrant said student suffer.

"Eventually the prices w high enough, but the studen have to eat the cost," he said

The committee also talked parking. Provo Assistant Di of Community Develo Kevin Callahan presented generated housing and pa data.

While .7 parking spaces occupant were required in today the requirement is one per occupant plus one guest per four units.

Callahan said reducing the ing space requirement wou building costs, thus giving opers more incentive to bu develop land.

Committee member Alton BYU Vice President of St Life, said there is plenty campus parking and stu should stop complaining abo

A woman fixes a cross in from of the National office of Elections in Lima, Peru on Thursday. President Alberto Fujimori has been forced into a run off with his rival Alejandro Toledo. ONPE has been criticized for its handling of the vote count.

Roncagliolo said, director of Transparencia, a private citizens' group.

Roncagliolo, whose organization monitored an unofficial vote count that showed Fujimori would be forced into a runoff, said the election tally announced Wednesday night was forced on the government by the close scrutiny from foreign governments and monitors.

Eduardo Stein, head of a team of monitors from the Organization of American States, complained Thursday that Fujimori's government was still dragging its feet in the investigation of charges that his campaign forged more than 1 million signatures to register his candidacy.

"This is only going to accumulate and augment the groundswell of mistrust we saw in the first count," he said.

But like other monitors, Stein said the announcement late Wednesday that a runoff would take place had ended the threat of social violence by anti-Fujimori activists.

"The tremendous tension that had been accumulating in the last three days began to weaken last night," he said.

For three days Toledo's supporters had demonstrated by the tens of thousands in Peru's major cities.

The former World Bank official had warned that the mostly peaceful marches and rallies could turn violent if Fujimori claimed victory.

Peru's ombudsman, Jorge Santistevan, a sharp critic of the government's campaign abuses, also expressed relief that there would be a runoff.

"What we would like to define now is how this second round can be better and, if possible, just the opposite of the first," Santistevan said.

During the campaign, opposition candidates accused Fujimori's military intelligence service of using rock-throwing thugs to disrupt political rallies, sponsoring lurid tabloid newspaper attacks and blocking access to largely state-controlled television and radio.

Fujimori, who has defended the first round of voting as fair and clean, has made no public response since election officials announced the runoff.

Officials, gunmaker to work out differences

Associated Press

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. — Government officials and Smith & Wesson pledged Thursday to work out differences over "clarifications" the gunmaker posted on its Web site concerning its landmark settlement with the Clinton administration.

The clarifications relate to a small portion of the agreement dealing with restrictions at gun-show sales.

The company said a requirement that its dealers make background checks and impose other restrictions on sales applies only to the sale of the gunmaker's firearms.

Smith & Wesson also said criminal background checks it agreed to for gun-show sales would apply only to firearms sold by licensed dealers and not used guns sold by private citizens.

Government lawyers have declined to say if they disagree with that interpretation, but lawyers for some municipalities have suggested the restrictions were meant to apply to all weapons sold by a dealer.

In a joint statement, the U.S. Treasury Department, the Department of Housing and Urban Affairs and Smith & Wesson said "the agreement is in full force."

Because of the March 17 deal, Smith & Wesson was dropped from many lawsuits that federal, state and local governments have filed against gunmakers.

"Clearly, there will be questions that need interpretation as we go along as this agreement is historic and without precedent," the statement said.

The Council passed the motion with a 4-1 majority that allows American Fork to have public hearings to give input into the design process. It also gives the city 90 days to decide what direction it will go with the contractors.

Although city committees and the public gave input during the design process, some people complained MHTN didn't change its design after it heard the input.

The Council discussed whether Jacobsen and MHTN should continue working on the project or whether the city should end the contract and begin with a new company.

"I was disappointed with the relationship between MHTN and the public," said Councilmember Don Hampton. "I'm not comfortable with locking ourselves into MHTN."

MHTN can't use everybody's idea or it will become a "hodgepodge situation," Mayor Ted Barratt told the Council on Tuesday.

"I thought they (MHTN) did a good job last time, but apparently I was the only one who thought that," Barratt said.

American Fork Police Chief Terry Fox said he sat in on the design process and he is pleased with what MHTN has done.

"I think it would be a real shame to throw out that insight that they have given us," he said.

Eighteen construction companies bid on the project. The city narrowed it down to seven companies and then it chose Jacobsen construction. Jacobsen then contracted MHTN to do the architecture work, Barratt said.

US West helps speed up Olympics

By Kimberly Nielsen
Nielsen@newsroom.byu.edu

High speed Internet access will soon be available in Olympic venue areas as US West completes the building of a fiber optics network.

The $175 million infrastructure contains six SONET — synchronized optical network — rings that are fully survivable in all conditions, said Mike Frandsen, Utah spokesman for US West.

"These are fiber-based telecommunications rings that will connect all the venues together," Frandsen said.

The network, which is about 30 percent complete, will be made up of underground cables that connect 10 competition sites from Provo to Park City, plus 17 non-competition sites like the media center and Olympic village, he said.

"The network creates secure, high-speed means to broadcasters, including the 7,000 press people that will be here for the Olympics," Frandsen said.

The Internet service offered by US West is called the Digital Subscriber Line MegaBit Service. According to the US West Web site, it will increase the speed of online connections by adding a high-speed digital connection on voice lines. The site said the connection speeds up data transmission up to 25 times faster than analog modems.

Frandsen said the Park City and Heber City areas are in need of the quick access. Not only will the Olympics benefit with the new upgrade, but residents of the venue sites will also be able to take advantage of the technology.

Frandsen said the fiber optics system will still be in use after the Games. It will offer a large capacity for wire and data transmissions to the Park City and Heber Valley areas.

"People will be amazed by what advanced telecommunications will be able to accomplish in the year 2002," said Solomon D. Trujillo, President and CEO of US West in a news release. "We are going to equip the Olympic Games with state-of-the-art systems that showcase our region's leadership in technology."

Frandsen said everything is on track for the Olympics. The network will be completed in time for the Olympics, he said.

A student surrounded by various remedies pretends to be overcome by an allergy. Because of the spring weather and the resulting spread of pollen, pharmacies are filling their shelves with a number of prescription choices.

"They have a lot of risk problems with them," Bronsky said.

Bronsky, who has been involved with the medicines in popular drugs like Seldane, Claritin, Zyrtec and Allegra, continues to work toward better and better ones. Intermountain Clinical Research performs clinical trials for pharmaceutical companies with new drugs and also tests the effectiveness of medicine already popular in other countries. Bronsky said drugs must be proven effective before they move out into the U.S. market.

The research is not dangerous and is designed to help his patients suffering from allergy symptoms, he said.

Bronsky said drug companies contact the center and tests only begin after doctors have decided whether the area has a population that would be appropriate for the study.

"We only do it if there is a good chance to help the patient," Bronsky said.

He said there are benefits to the patients and to the public as a whole.

"It allows me to get people that come in that we can educate about their disease ... I can help apply that to millions of people," Bronsky said.

Millions of Americans do stand to gain from new allergy medicine. According to the American Academy of Allergy Asthma and Immunology Medical Association, at least 35 million Americans have hay fever.

Allergy medicine makes up a substantial part of the pharmaceutical drug business.

According to a report by the Prime Institute, the popular antihistamine Claritin generated almost $2 billion in revenues for Schering-Plough Corp. in 1998.

Schering is supporting a bill in the U.S. Senate that would enable drug companies to seek drug patent restoration of up to three years if the FDA took more than 5 years for approval.

Start II deal under debate by Russia

Associated Press

MOSCOW — Despite protests from hard-liners, Russia's parliament began work Thursday on approving the long-stalled START II treaty, which would clear the way for huge cuts in the U.S. and Russian nuclear arsenals.

The lower house of parliament, the State Duma, went into a closed session for briefings from Foreign Minister Igor Ivanov and Defense Ministry Igor Sergeyev. They urged lawmakers to pass the treaty when it comes up for a vote today.

START II would halve U.S. and Russian nuclear arsenals to about 3,000-3,500 warheads each by the end of 2007.

The Duma is expected to approve the treaty, which was ratified by the U.S. Senate in 1996. Centrist parties gained a majority in the Duma in elections in December, ending years of control by the Communists and their hard-line allies.

"Many understand the need for ratification," Sergeyev said. "Communists will probably vote against, but there is no evidence or arguments to convince one that ratification would fail."

President Vladimir Putin, who won elections in March, has urged the Duma to approve START II. Putin has balanced his call to restore Russia as a great power with a pragmatic policy of preserving good relations with the West.

The Communists have called the START II treaty a disgrace, warning it would weaken Russia and give the United States military superiority.

Sunny weather pulls students outside to study March 27. The sunny weather also draws students away from studying on reading days before final exams.

Reading days not always spent reading

By Lois Hassell
Lois@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

This year has embraced a new century, millennium, Conference Center and the shocking news of the NCMO Web site.

But now, once again, BYU students enter the end of a semester with the tradition of reading days.

The supposed days spent studying for finals.

Inaugurated with a late-night campus party, reading days are spent with utmost appreciation from both students and faculty.

The more diligent of students profess complete loyalty to the reading days and spend the entire time studying, much like the worker ants amongst the grasshopper.

"I usually study the whole time. It's a great break before tests and time to study because the assignments are all turned in," said Matt Squires, a junior from Vernal, Uintah County, majoring in English.

Aside from grading and review sessions, professors and students alike use this time to do things they had to shelf during the cram of the semester.

"I should be grading, but I usually just sit around talking about higher ideals," said Edward Adams, communications associate professor.

Steve Thomsen, communications associate professor, was able to finish a manuscript during reading days.

Marcus Bowers, a sophomore from Salt Lake City majoring in music performance, said he found time to perfect some of the finer and better tasting things in life.

"This morning I finally achieved perfection with my breakfast burrito," Bowers said.

For the perpetually busy students the pace will not slacken until after finals, when they can hang up their Jansport backpacks for the summer.

"I am working on my thesis and grading papers. The reading days for me are more than full speed ahead, things don't let up until after finals," said Jack LaBaugh, a mass communications graduate student and TA from Montana.

Students welcome the change of pace, and the university quietly accepts the dissipation of students during reading days.

Following finals, the campus will die down to only a few students who stay and actually take classes during Spring and Summer Terms. The campus will now be the ground for CES symposiums, women's conference, Education Week and other conferences.

The flow of on-campus freshmen will trickle down as the dorms fill with troops of Especially For Youth participants.

ARREST

The individual who stole two laptop computers from Budge Hall in Helaman Halls was arrested this week thanks to The Daily Universe Police Beat.

An individual read the Police Beat and later heard someone talking near his apartment complex about the two laptop computers.

The individual contacted University Police, who interviewed the suspect.

He was arrested after the police found the laptops in his possession.

The computers have been returned to the rightful owners.

THEFT

A 22-year-old student's bicycle was stolen from Tingey Hall in Heritage Halls sometime between 7 p.m. on Saturday and 9 p.m. on Sunday.

The owner stored the bicycle in basement storage at the building. The bike is a Gary Fischer Big Sur mountain bike and is dark blue in color.

The serial number has been entered into the national crime computer. The bike is estimated to be worth $900.

As the winter semester of 2000 draws to a close, we want to thank you, the students, for your efforts to make BYU a Zion community this year. On behalf of the Student Service Association, we wish you well this summer.

We are extremely excited, and look forward to serving you this coming year. Please know that we are eager to meet you, to hear your ideas, and help out however we can.

Congratulations to those of you who are graduating. Good luck in your future endeavors as you move on to new opportunities.

Beginning spring term we will be in the Student Leadership Offices, 3400 WSC. Find us there or reach us at 378-3901. Feel free to stop by anytime!

Sincerely,

rt H. Todd, faculty adviser lding the Mini Baja, said BYU's third year in the tition. Both the capstone nior teams will be compet- said.

Todd said the Mini Baja was a great opportunity for students to design and build a car from scratch.

"The only thing supplied to them is the engine," he said.

The Society of Automotive Engineers set restrictions on building the cars for safety, Haws said. He said they use a specific engine, and must meet specific size and weight requirements.

"It has to hold a person up to a certain height – 6 feet 4 inches — and weight – 190," he said.

Andrew Woodings, 26, a graduate student from Basin City, Wash., majoring in mechanical engineering, coached the undergraduate students who built the car. "Everyone has the same amount of power; you have to use your power better," he said.

Woodings said BYU has a good car this year. The design is simpler, lighter and more aesthetically pleasing than previous years.

Haws said his favorite part of the competition is the two-mile endurance track. Cars are given four hours to see which can run the most laps.

"It's rocks, logs, mud, water, some dry — it's a pretty crazy course," he said.

Woodings said he was a driver for the first BYU capstone team. He said he enjoyed the exhilaration of driving. "It's a rush because you're driving wheel to wheel against the University of Utah. It's exciting."

Haws said along with endurance, cars are judged on marketability, design, build and strength. Haws said the first time his team walked the course, it was nervous about damaging the vehicle.

Woodings said the competition is fairly safe for drivers. There have been rumors of drivers being injured, but he said he has never seen any.

Todd said team members come from various departments on campus. Learning to work on a cross-functional team will be a good skill for students later in life.

"While I'm sleeping, one of my roommates steals my clothes. I don't even notice until I see him on campus wearing them," Beckstead said.

Even toilet paper is mysteriously being borrowed from Scott McCombs' bathroom.

Although presumptuous roommates can be aggravating, there is a cure, said Zach Withers, 22, a junior from Simsbury, Conn., majoring in philosophy and economics.

Withers said that roommates should feel comfortable sharing because he would do the same "if he has and his roommates have not."

"He who takes, is willing to share," Wilson said.

With all of these grumbles and rumbles from neat roommates, they should remember that the other roommates have just as many complaints, said Beth Ann Snell, 21, a senior from Brookville, Penn., majoring in political science.

Nevertheless, Snell and other unkempt roommates do not need to despair. They can win the battle against their cleanliness conscious roommates, said Toelupe Toelupe, 21, a sophomore from Laie, Hawaii, majoring in social work.

"I had a mission companion who would mark on his milk carton where the milk was at. I would still drink it and then just fill it up with water," Toelupe said.

Curator speaks on Card collection

Orson Scott Card signs books in the BYU Bookstore on Sept. 13, 1999. A special collection dedicated to Card in the Harold B. Lee Library includes his published and unpublished writing, as well as other correspondence and memorabilia.

BYU students and faculty may be familiar with writer Orson Scott Card. But deep within the Harold B. Lee Library exists a special collection of Card's works that may not be as well known.

Robert L. Maxwell, HBLL cataloger and curator of the Orson Scott Card collection, presented a speech titled "Ender and Friends" on Thursday morning.

Maxwell said his purpose was not to speak about Card as a person or speculate about where Card gets his ideas.

"My hope is that this lecture will spur people's interests to come and do some serious research about this remarkable author," Maxwell said.

The collection does not exist just to satisfy curiosities, Maxwell said.

People need to gain permission from Russ Taylor, reference specialist, before beginning research with the collection, Maxwell said.

The collection was started in 1978 and includes both published items and papers. The papers include manuscripts of plays and poetry, including non-published works and Card's work with magazines of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

Correspondences, music and production materials from the movie "The Abyss," including schematic drawings and storyboards, are also part of the collection, Maxwell said.

Although Card and his wife, Kristine, live with their five children in North Carolina, he still visits the HBLL on occasion — but at times without anyone knowing.

Maxwell said he was looking in the library stacks one day when he found a book not from the special collection that was signed by Card.

"I believe Card came in to the library one day and was just looking around to see what books of his that we had," Maxwell said, "and he wrote in one of our library books."

Maxwell shared Card's message to BYU students and said that at least Card did sign a book he had written.

The special Orson Scott Card collection can be found in Special Collections on the first floor of the HBLL. Card's published novels may also be found in the library on the fifth floor, Maxwell said.

Maxwell said there are many ways for people to look for the collection in the library's online catalog. An individual can use the general call number for Card, which is PZ 4.C178, and select "SPEC-COLL" to virtually browse the collection's contents.

Siblings to visit Venezuela to hand out loans

By Carrie Lundgren

A brother and sister team is prepared to travel to Venezuela this summer to assist others in entrepreneurial dreams.

As participants in Help International, Andy Nicoll and Jen Nicoll will be loaning out small amounts of money to help Vanezuelans begin and succeed in their business endeavors.

Known as micro credit, people traveling to South America will give $50 loans to help finance natives' aspirations in beginning their own businesses, said Andy, 23, a junior from Hartford, Conn., majoring in accounting.

The loan money is collected by donations to Help International.

"Micro credit is literally small loans. With our program, we travel to poor countries to give out these loans. Eventually, the people are able to get out of poverty," Andy said. "It takes money to make money."

With the loans, individuals are able to buy the resources and materials needed to begin their endeavors.

Many women participate in the business loans, Andy said. "Men usually find themselves in an industry with steady pay. However, the women at home have lots of business ideas and want to make extra money," he said. "If you invest with a woman, you are investing in a family."

Recipients of the loans receive financial training before and after the loan is issued. Their education helps them make good business decisions, said Jen, 26, a Sandy resident.

Training the loan recipients is not the only way Jen expects to help the Venezuelan economy. Students will partner with an existing financial institutions in the country to ensure that microcredit aid continues once they leave, she said.

Students can help the people of South America by attending a benefit concert tonight at Club Omni, Jen said. Doors open at 6:30 and the cover cost is $5. All profits will go to Help International.

Company recruit mono virus dono

It has been two months since he first got sick, but some mornings he still feels as if he is waking up from a coma.

"I have to pry open my eyelids. It feels like I just pulled two all-nighters in a row," said Jake Godard, a junior from East Brunswick, N.J., majoring in international area studies.

And this is after all his regular symptoms are gone.

The initial signs of a sore throat and fever led him to the doctor, who first told him he had strep throat. When the medication was not working, Godard went back again.

This time, he was told he had mononucleosis.

He was then told to rest and drink plenty of liquids.

"It was strange that I felt like I was dying and it was like, OK, you have mono — have a nice day. There was no follow-up," he said.

Godard was on his couch for almost two weeks, and still has to miss a class here and there because he does not have the energy to go. He had to quit his job and limit anything that would keep him from getting eight to nine hours of sleep per night.

But some nights he is so tired, he cannot sleep.

And sometimes getting a lot of sleep isn't enough.

"Sometimes it just hits me. I'll be taking it easy, sitting in the library at 2 p.m., and I'll get so tired," he said. "It's so frustrating — there's so many things your mind wants to do but your body will not cooperate."

Bill Consedine, of SeraCare, Inc., based in Oceanside, Calif., said that is just the nature of the mono virus.

"There's just not much you can do," he said.

Consedine, a national plasma donor recruiter, also recruits donors who have certain viruses, including the mono virus, so the plasma can be used for diagnostics and test kits.

"Every virus is a little different," he said.

Wedding Singer

Crooner gives traditional songs new popularity

By Meredith Young

With spring in the air, diamond rings on fingers and Martha Stewart Weddings magazines off of the shelves and in the clutches of brides-to-be, choosing a song is one of the many things to do in preparation for the big day.

The trend for receptions is to hire bands instead of DJs, to add the elegance and sophistication that everyone would like to believe somehow existed in the past. But some brides want the musical time machines the classics offer without the expense and limitations of live bands.

One of the top-five first dance songs in Martha Stewart Weddings magazine is "The Way You Look Tonight," next to Nat King Cole's "Unforgettable."

Versions of "The Way You Look Tonight" have been recorded by Tony Bennett, Frank Sinatra and Harry Connick Jr. and have appeared in movies such as "My Best Friend's Wedding."

The theme song from 1991's "Father of the Bride" offers another version of this classic with an upbeat rhythms and blues feel.

"We knew we wanted a heartfelt version of 'The Way You Look Tonight' for the scene when Martin first sees his daughter dancing with her new husband," said music producer Steve Tyrell to the Houston Chronicle.

After singing in "Father of the Bride," Tyrell, who has produced music for Linda Ronstadt and LL Cool J, received hundreds of letters from around the world, asking him where they could buy his CD, Tyrell said

"It was nice to have so many people calling about the work I'd done on those films, but it didn't seem like enough to build a whole album around," Tyrell said to Lip Service magazine.

After listening to friends and family's encouragement to record a CD, Tyrell changed his mind.

"I had a great idea to make 'A New Standard' and tip my hat to the great national treasures who are still alive," Tyrell said.

Guest appearances include Harry "Sweets" Edison, who performed with Frank Sinatra; Clark Terry, Duke Ellington's trumpeter; Toots Thielemans, harmonica genius; as well as Joe Sample, Louie Bellson and Plas Johnson.

Lantern magazine talked about the making of the CD.

"(It) was similar to the making of a historical preservation document. The solos in the songs are played by the original drummers, trumpeters, trombonists, and musicians who played in the '30s and '40s for artists such as Gershwin, Sinatra and Holiday."

Network magazine also commented on the singer.

"Tyrell sings a collection of standards with a stylistic and graceful swagger that brings a bygone era firmly into the present more efficiently than even your favorite scrapbook."

Tyrell said the music was written specifically for the younger generation — he wanted music that was "cross-generational," that college students and grandparents alike could enjoy.

"In a world of black tie jazz, Tyrell is a T-shirt and sports coat kind of guy, a neighbor you might see waving over a picket fence one day, securing a music deal the next," said Megan Dickerson of the Daily Bruin.

Tyrell's CD began to gain momentum when the owner of a posh Los Angeles-based restau-

Stations say 'Goodbye' to song about murder

By Emily Smurthwaite
smurthwaite@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Monday Editor

Mary Anne and Wanda were the best of friends.

But then they graduated, and Mary Anne went to Atlanta. And Wanda found Earl.

Wanda and Earl got married, and soon after the abuse began. Wanda finally filed for divorce, but Earl beat her again, and she ended up in intensive care.

Mary Anne came home to console her friend, and soon they made a decision that Earl had to die.

Goodbye Earl.

So begins the story sung by the Dixie Chicks about the abusive relationship that ends with poisoned black-eyed peas.

"Goodbye Earl" is the fourth release on the Dixie Chicks' second CD, "Fly."

It may seem strange to have lyrics about the murder of an abusive husband sung to peppy music, but listeners don't seem to mind.

Billboard magazine listed "Goodbye Earl " at No. 20 on the Billboard top 100 for April 15. "Fly" was the No. 13 album, according to the Billboard charts.

Although other country stars have released songs on domestic abuse, some radio stations have chosen not to air "Goodbye Earl."

Lon Helton, the country music editor for Radio & Records, told the Los Angeles Times that about 20 of 149 country stations tracked by the trade publication are not playing it.

"My question is, what do we do a song about next: school shootings?" said John Pellegrini to the Los Angeles Times. Pellegrini is the program director of a York, Pa., station, WGTY-FM, which is not playing the single.

But don't worry, the Dixie Chicks don't encourage murder. Underneath the lyrics on the CD, the listener is assured that "The Dixie Chicks do not advocate premeditated murder, but love getting even."

Ryan Stokes, 22, a sophomore from Los Alamos, N.M., said he likes "Goodbye Earl," but he said it's getting old because it is overplayed.

"I think the Dixie Chicks are able to have fun with their songs," he said. "That makes their music effective."

He said that women love the song because they attach Earl to all the guys who have been jerks to them.

"Earl becomes a scapegoat," he said.

Last semester, Stokes was a non-committal returned missionary, he said, which frustrated a woman he previously dated. One day, the woman and her roommates told him they wanted to play a song for him. They crowded around Stokes, turned up the volume and started playing "Goodbye Earl."

"When they screamed the lyrics that said, 'Earl had to die' in my face, I got the subtle impression that I was Earl," he said.

But Stokes thinks his story has a good ending.

"Now, I'm a little more committed, and now she's singing, 'Cowboy, take me away,'" he said.

Stokes said he doesn't think the song belittles the seriousness of domestic abuse.

"I don't think that's the intent of the song," he said.

Heather George, 20, a junior from Roanoke, Va., majoring in elementary education, said she loves the song, but she said she thinks if the lyrics were put with heavy metal music, it would be offensive.

"It's three cute, little country girls singing it; the last thing they would do is go and kill someone," George said.

She said she doesn't see any reason for radio stations to boycott the song.

"There are other songs about abuse; the Dixie Chicks have just taken it a step further," she said.

Don't shop, eat or break dance in NYC

Special to the Universe

Contrary to what you would think, politics is a fairly safe subject to throw around in New York. Everyone here agrees that everything that goes wrong (including bad golf scores and stomach cramps) is Mayor Giuliani's fault and that Hillary is an opportunistic carpetbagger with a greasy husband.

I was pretty pro-Giuliani up until two days ago. There was a group of teen-agers dressed like they were going to a rave demonstrating in Times Square against Giuliani. Anyway, they had this amazingly catchy chant that I'm pretty sure went like this: "Shake your booty, Yes! Vote for Rudy, No!"

Needless to say, my friends and I were chanting this for hours afterwards and, like any good piece of propaganda, it finally sunk in to the point that now I'm leaning Clinton. (People say that I'm pretty impressionable, and I suppose I must be since everyone says so.)

I realize that many of you might be visiting New York this summer, so I've written down all of the helpful advice that I could think of that wasn't already in any of the New York travel books that I saw. (i.e. — Even though you'll hear people in Provo refer to BYU as the "Harvard of the West," I've found that people look at you funny when you refer to Harvard as "The BYU of the East.")

If you're the artsy-fartsy type (I prefer to think of myself as more of the former than the later) the Metropolitan Museum of Art is the best place in the city.

Besides having the most amazing collection of art, it's also the only place in New York where you can get completely lost and not worry about ending up in an area where you'll be jacked for your wallet.

Unless, of course, you end up in the cafeteria where apparently they believe that the worth of a ham and cheese croissant is directly proportional to how close it gets to famous works of art. Unfortunately, this theory doesn't do much to explain why airports charge what they do for their crummy sandwiches.

I strongly recommend stopping by the Stock Exchange on Wall Street. You sit watching stressed out sweaty guys scream and throw paper and realize that the world's economy rests on their shoulders. After seeing that, having a year's supply of food in storage seems like a dang good idea.

The Statue of Liberty is always a favorite. For those, though, who are looking to save $6.50 might I suggest taking the free Stanton Island ferry that floats by the statue without actually landing there, then going back to your hotel and pretending you're climbing up the statue by running up and down the stairs with your eyes closed. Of course, if you want an even more realistic effect, you can yell fire on the top floor of the hotel and run down the stairs with a mass of people throwing elbows.

Central Park is great because you get to see the lost arts of break dancing and roller-skate dancing brought back from the pop fad abyss. In fact, after you watch them for a while your eyes glaze over and you start to wonder why these smooth-looking moves ever went out of style.

Of course, once your buddy standing next to you starts trying to do the Robot or grabs your arm to do the body wave, you're jolted back to the cold reality that only .0015 percent of the population can actually do these moves without looking like they're having some sort of seizure.

They say people come from around the world to shop in New York, but I'm not buying it (maybe pun intended, maybe not. I haven't decided). By my estimate, 72 percent of all clothing stores in New York are either Gaps or Banana Republics, which, we all know, are the exact same stores. (I find this disturbing because didn't Banana Republic used to be a safari-theme store who's mascot was that imperialistic British guy who sported a monocle and his "let's take over India" outfit? Now it just sells Gap clothes with triple stitching.)

Of course, what would a trip to New York be without Broadway? When I came out, I decided I was going to see as many plays as I could. With my finances being the way they are, though, this has meant seeing these shows from less than optimal spots (except for the shows where I can sneak down to the nice seats once the overture starts).

This was never more apparent than when I went to the Lincoln Center to see the Metropolitan Opera's revival (isn't everything they do a revival?) of "The Barber of Seville."

After scaling enough stairs to make the Tanner Building seem pathetic, I figured that I must have been getting close to my seat.

This optimism quickly diminished when I had to slap on some crampons and grab an ice pick to get up that final glacier that was covering rows QQQQ through TTTT.

If my memory serves me correctly, the operas had a lot less Elton John music, transvestites and giant helicopters.

To wrap up the New York experience, I'd like to recall the words of the immortal Wayne Newton for a moment.

"I recall Central Park in fall. You tore your dress. What a mess. I confess. Dankeschön." In its own strange way, that pretty much sums up New York for me.

Interior designers create edible chairs

By Nate Mathis
nate@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

You can look, but you can't touch, and even though you might be hungry, you probably wouldn't want to eat — unless you don't mind the taste of glue.

The Third Annual Incredible Edible Chair Contest, sponsored by the International Interior Design Association took place in Salt Lake City on Thursday.

Interior Design companies and other creative people came from all around Utah to participate in the event that hosted chairs made of anything from Jell-O to saltine crackers.

"It's always been a fun event that is very well attended," said Julie McHood of MHTN Architects.

"Last year we tried to imitate a Scandinavian-type chair that we made out of pasta and cheese," she said.

McHood, who has participated in the event since it started, said she has seen chairs made out of pretzels, tootsie rolls and even heads of lettuce.

The International Interior Design Association is a professional networking and educational association of more than 11,000 members in eight specialty forums, nine regions, and more than 30 chapters around the world.

The Rocky Mountain Chapter currently has 460 members in Utah, Colorado, and Wyoming.

The Incredible Edible Chair Contest began as an annual tradition for the Salt Lake City Center of the Rocky Mountain Chapter in 1998.

The rules are very specific. The chair must be 90 percent or more edible, and it can be a scale model or a full-size chair. The chair can be an individual or group effort, but it must be able to support itself for a minimum of eight hours and must have a base or tray to catch any falling parts.

"It gives us a chance to get together with other interior design companies and talk about the things they are doing," McHood said. "It's a fun event every year."

McHood, who teaches an interior design class at BYU, said the Interior Design Department has an Interior Design Club that is affiliated with the International Interior Design Association, and several students participated in the chair competition.

Other companies around Utah helped with prizes, including the prize for the edible "Best of Show" chair. The winner received a leather upholstered Mayfair chair, courtesy of Bernhardt. The "Most Creative" chair received a fine art original, courtesy of Art Works. Other prizes were given for the "Most Innovative Use of Materials," "Best Group" and "Best Student" entries.

pleased to announce in honor of Robert C. said David Randall, the School of Music.

"We appreciate the opportunity to assist some of the finest students in the country who are currently attending BYU."

The scholarships and first student recipient, Tim Workman, were announced at BYU's Philharmonic/Choral Concert on April 7.

"I am very honored that they would even consider me for this award," said Workman, 21, a sophomore from St. George, majoring in vocal performance. "It's a real treat to be recognized for my accomplishments."

Bowden enjoys a long-standing relationship with BYU as he has earned degrees in both music education and composition, and a Presidential Citation in August 1999.

After BYU, Bowden's education continued with a second master's degree at the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston and a doctorate in musical composition at the University of Utah.

Bowden has also performed as a guest conductor for the Boston Pops Orchestra and served more than 25 years as director of the Mormon Youth Symphony and Chorus. He has recorded more than 30 albums, composed cantatas and pageants, arranged hymns and anthems and often performed more than 25 concerts a year throughout the Mountain West. Although Bowden has achieved many accomplishments in the field of music, he was very surprised to learn a scholarship would be named in his honor.

"I couldn't believe it," Bowden said.

"Not in my wildest dreams could I have imagined that I could have this honor."

Bowden is also grateful to the family that endows this scholarship.

"My wife and I are impressed that the Peery family would create this award without seeking publicity or honor for themselves," Bowden said.

CPR encouraged for everyone

In conjunction with the American Red Cross, Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, is working to promote one member of every family or business to certify in CPR.

Cannon will certify in adult CPR on Saturday and invites all members of the community ages 17 and older to earn their own certifications.

Cannon co-sponsored a bill with Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, in September which designates the third weekend as national CPR weekend. The bill was brought on in the wake of several Utah natural disasters.

In recognizing the success of the increasing rate of survivals due to CPR administration, the bill sponsors sought to enhance public awareness of the need of such training.

American Red Cross certificates can be earned in adult, child and infant CPR. Certification will be at 865 N. Freedom Blvd. from 8 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. To register, call 379-2500.

Brady will return to tell new graduates about her experiences in South Africa, teaching women how to use modern medicine to help raise healthy children.

She landed a job with a non-governmental organization (NGO) after graduating in 1998 and is preparing for graduate school in Public Health from either John Hopkins University or the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine.

"I haven't been accepted to London yet, but if I get accepted, I'll probably go there," she said.

Brady wants BYU graduates to know that finding good jobs is about persistence and dedication, not luck.

"I just want students to realize that if they're committed to working in their respective fields and are willing to make a difference, there's no reason why they can't land that dream job," she said.

"People say that you just 'fall into' your first job, and it's true that doors open up in really strange ways. But you still have to pursue those opportunities, not wait for things to fall in your lap," she said.

Brady works as a senior program assistant with Management Sciences for Health, an NGO that coordinates efforts to help fight the five most common causes of childhood death: pneumonia, diarrhea, malnutrition, malaria and measles.

"We know how to treat all five of them," Brady said. "And still they account for more than 70 percent of childhood deaths each year."

Brady said she got interested in public health programs after taking a political science class taught by professors Valerie Hudson and Donna Lee Bowen.

The class focused on the importance of women in political economies.

"It was the best class I took at BYU," Brady said. "I walked out of there with a totally different perspective on things like breast-feeding and family planning. And I suddenly could see how cultural, social, economic and political issues affect public health — that's when I decided to get involved."

Tiffany Zenith Ivins, who graduated from BYU in 1999 and spent last summer in South Africa with Brady, said she's not surprised Dean Holsinger asked her to speak.

"Bethany is one of those women who makes things happen for everyone around her," Ivins said. "I went to South Africa with her because I knew she'd make it worthwhile."

Ivins said that Brady is the perfect example of a BYU graduate who's making a difference. In fact, she wishes the entire graduating class could hear her speak.

"She's going places," she said.

is $28 for the cap and gown," said VanAusdal.

Although most graduates have ordered their caps and gowns, those who haven't ordered yet can order them up to the day of graduation, she said.

"An option open to the seniors is that they can also purchase a T-shirt for $10," VanAusdal said.

Graduation announcements, which cost $1 individually, are also an option to the seniors, Bethers said.

Bethers said she has seen a variety of announcements purchased by the graduates.

"How many one orders depends on what they want," Bethers said. "We've sold 50 to some and two to another."

Another purchase open to the graduates is a class ring.

Michelle Leonard graduated last year with a bachelor's degree in sociology. Leonard feels the cost of a class ring is worth it.

"They can be expensive, but it's a good reminder of all the hard work and effort spent at college," Leonard said. "I wear mine every day."

As far as price goes, Leonard said she recalls the cost of the rings ranging in the hundreds.

Cheri Pitcher in the bookstore gift department said the bookstore works with the ring associates in creating space for a show room several times throughout the semester.

"How much a ring costs depends on what the student wants. The custom made rings usually run a little more," Pitcher said.

Basically, it's up to the graduates on how much they want to spend.

"Graduates should definitely make the most of the occasion," Leonard said.

Y graduation requirements lowered to hurry graduation

By Michael Hyte
Hyte@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

D's can now earn degrees, and so can completing fewer hours of upper division credits.

BYU released new graduation requirements Thursday, which are effective immediately.

"We anticipate these changes will allow many students to graduate a semester earlier than before," said Noel Reynolds, associate academic vice president.

Traditionally, BYU students were required to complete at least 40 hours of upper division credit. Upper division courses are those with a course number of 300 or larger. The change eliminates this requirement for students.

"Some majors focus more on lower division courses. The former requirement fell heavily on these majors," Reynolds said.

Furthermore, Reynolds said BYU surveyed the best universities across the country and found few had requirements for upper division courses or D credit.

In addition, the limitation on counting more than 15 hours of D credit towards graduation was also removed.

"We found this requirement forced many students to retake courses in unproductive ways," Reynolds said.

Moreover, Reynolds said there are "other mechanisms in place that regulate poor academic performance. The limitation on D credit was redundant and somewhat problematic."

Students will still be required to maintain a minimum GPA of 2.0 in order to graduate.

Likewise, an average GPA of 2.0 during any given semester is still required in order to remain in good academic standing with the university.

Reynolds said many individual colleges on campus place restrictions on D credit within the major, and that those policies will remain effective.

The changes in graduation requirements were recommended by the University Curriculum Committee, which is comprised of associate deans from each college on campus.

The committee discovered that the criteria for distinguishing lower and upper division courses vary across campus, Reynolds said.

"These restrictions are more common for schools trying to make a name for themselves on the national scene, but become unnecessary in mature institutions," Reynolds said.

Reynolds said he is not sure how many students will be able to graduate sooner as a result of the new policy.

However, last year's change in graduation requirements, 120 credit hours instead of 128, allows about 400 more students to graduate a semester earlier per each graduation.

Reynolds said this week's changes are driven by two motives: to extend the BYU experience to more students, and to align BYU more closely with practices of other major universities.

Valuable lessons in service prepare seniors to go forth

By Rodney Zwahlen
Rodney@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

Walking among 30,000 students can make even the most confident student feel helpless, but at BYU, students are taught by administrators, teachers and church leaders that service is the key to finding self-worth.

Many students said although the size of BYU can be intimidating, the experience gained on campus depends on each student's desire to become involved.

"You get out of it what you put into it," said Justin Rauzon, 20, from Mission Viejo, Calif., majoring in zoology.

"If you change the motto, 'Enter to learn, go forth to serve,' to, 'Enter to learn, go forth to make money,' you can make a lot of money. But there is something more important than that," he said.

> "If you change the motto, 'Enter to learn, go forth to serve,' to, 'Enter to learn, go forth to make money,' you can make a lot of money. But there is something more important than that."
> — Justin Rauzon, BYU student

Many students said the predominant theme at BYU is service.

"Service is pushed a lot here, and there are a lot of opportunities to serve," said Tiffani Marx, 24, a senior from Spokane, Wash., majoring in early childhood development.

"I feel like I've had more chances to serve at BYU than I ever had before," she said.

Even first-year students are awed at the countless service opportunities provided by various campus organizations.

"The (Jacobsen) Center for Service and Learning helps you get outside yourself, think about others and not be so selfish," said Blake Barber, 19, a freshman from Boonville, Iowa, majoring in mechanical engineering.

Barber's friend, Lindsay Page, 18, a freshman from Clayton, Calif.,who hasn't declared a major, said she enjoys the freedom to choose from many worthy endeavors.

"There are a lot of opportunities and so many options to be able to do whatever you want," she said.

Barber said being at BYU helps young adults who might otherwise lose control of their lives when they leave home.

"It helps to keep you from losing track of your life at this point, when it is so easy to lose track of things," he said.

Lorie Hobbs, who attended BYU from 1974-75 and now lives in Thousand Oaks, Calif., said the BYU community nurtures self-worth in its students.

"The main thing I got from BYU was confidence," she said. "The surroundings are comfortable, and it's easy to be successful."

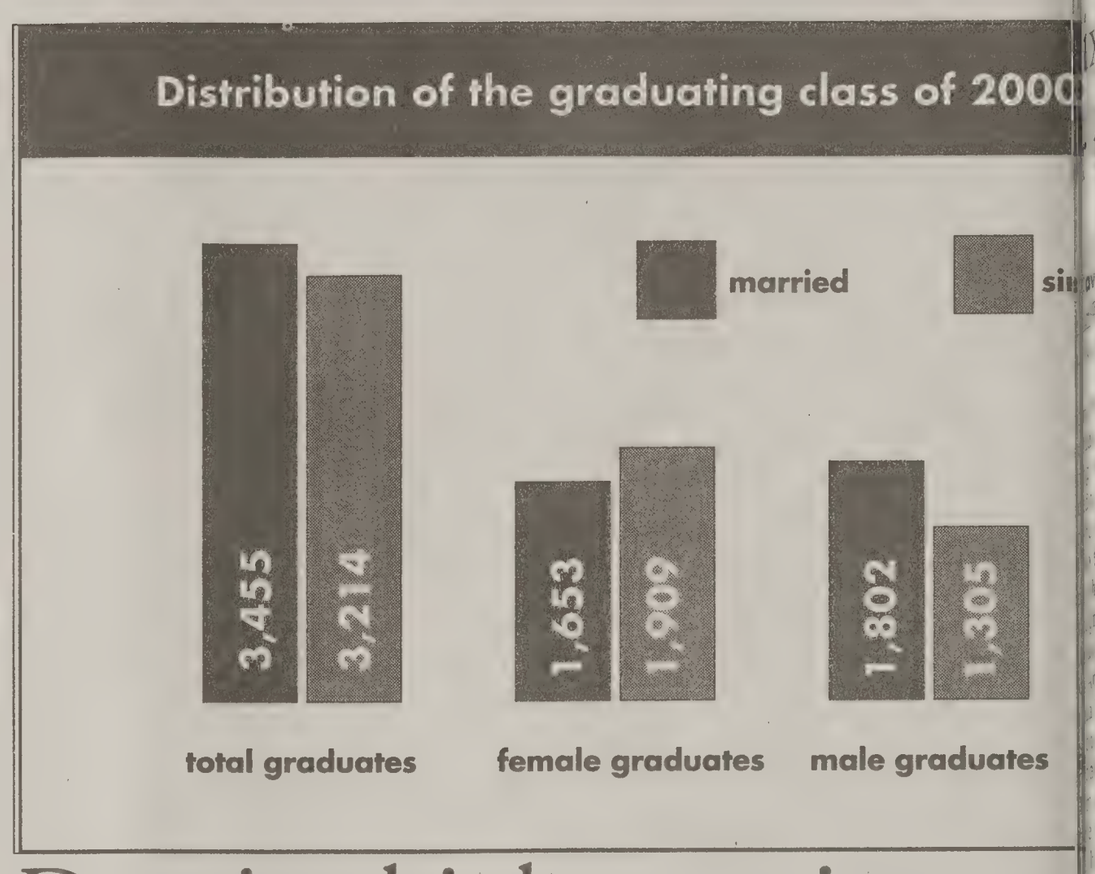
Hobbs also said she learned valuable lessons about the Relief Society at BYU that have helped her serve more effectively.

"BYU is the very best place to start Relief Society because it's all with girls your own age, and the peers are your leaders," she said.

"For most girls, it's also their first visiting teaching experience. In outside wards, not much is expected of the 19- to 24-year-old women, but at BYU they learn to visit teach effectively," Hobbs said.

Brady Fife, 23, a junior from Everett, Wash., majoring in global trade and economy, said the emphasis school and church leaders place on such activities as family home evening, intramural athletics and religion courses allows students to develop untapped talents.

"There's not such a secular focus here," he said. "It's a more well-rounded focus."



Despite high marriage ra some come away from Y sin

By Alysa Phillips
Alysa@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

As the graduating class of 2000 prepares to enter "real life," marital status is on the minds of many.

BYU has more marriages than any other institute of higher learning in the United States, said Jeff Hill, professor of marriage, family and human development.

Although many people do find their spouses and marry while they are attending BYU, it is only a slight majority.

According to statistics provided by University Communications, 52 percent of graduates from the 1998-1999 school year were married.

Single graduating seniors face some uncertainty in the future, but most say it is not that big of an issue.

"When I came here I didn't think I would (graduate single)," said Chris Swanson, 25, from West Point, Ga., graduating single with a degree in history. "It's a little bit scary. In the back of my mind, I wonder what's gonna happen next."

Swanson said he hasn't wasted his time here. He dated and had a lot of fun.

Matt Nelson, 25, from Rancho Cucamonga, Calif., graduating single with a master's degree in exercise science, said he is not concerned about his marital status.

"There are Mormons everywhere," he said. "When you leave, there will be less people, but the quality doesn't change."

Nelson said he values the time he had at BYU.

"I have had good dating experiences here, so I know what I want," he said.

Weston Cann, 28, from Orem, graduating single in math education, said single graduates can play more.

"When you graduate single, you don't have to worry quite so much about getting a job and supporting a family," he said.

"You have more opportunities when you are single. You're a lot more free to take off to South America or Egypt."

Graduates are called to serve

While some off to careers, others are missionary-bound

By Kristen Bush

While most seniors leave BYU to enter the work force, a few will spread their wings to leave on missions for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

"It's going to be a lifestyle change," said Brian Stephenson, 19, a senior from Sedona, Ariz., graduating in chemical engineering.

Stephenson, who came to BYU at 17, said it is weird preparing for a mission when his peers were heading to companies like Intel and Motorola.

Joseph Pergler also finished his undergraduate degree before his mission. The transition was natural for him, said his father Harold Pergler.

"Age-wise, he wasn't as old as the others, but maturity-wise, he was higher," Pergler said.

Kenneth Solen, chair of the chemical engineering department, said he has seen a few students go through the program at a young age, and they all seemed well-adjusted.

Solen said he thought it would be an academic challenge responding to the difficulty that comes from a demanding program.

"Often stamina and self-confidence take a few years to develop," he said.

Stephenson said people often create misconceptions about him because of his age.

"To graduate early you don't have to be brilliant, but you do have to be committed," he said.

"Being diligent is a big part of your grade."

Stephenson said he is looking forward to the two-year break before beginning his masters, but he is not sure what the pros and cons will be.

He said leaving chemical engineering is safe because it is a more stable major than something like computer science.

"The fundamentals I've learned as an undergraduate should be about the same," Stephenson said.

Solen said while the fundamentals do not change, the applications of the major are constantly being upgraded.

With dreams of going to Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Stephenson said he fears forgetting what he learned while he is on his mission.

"As soon as I get back from my mission, I'm going to start studying right away," he said.

"It's up to you," Jordan said. "You choose where your life goes from now on."

"It's empowering," he said. "You are able to contribute to society."

"By going to the root of the problem, we'll affect change," Steckley said.

But to be able to do this is another task.

One must now find a job and truly enter the real world.

Dave Cook, graduating with a degree in economics, credits the Career Placement Office as a huge aid in his quest for post-graduate work.

"I was nervous until I got my first job offer, then it was a huge relief," Cook said.

"I have a chance to have a change," he said. "It's a sense of satisfaction and accomplishment."

Wade Bean, also an economics major, agrees.

"This is the opportunity to be where I've always seen myself since I was young," Bean said.

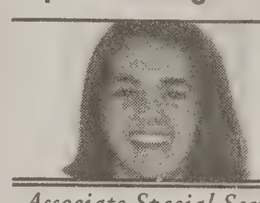
"Now I have to be a 'grown up.' I will finally be doing something productive."

"It's like buying tools at Eagle Hardware and not being able to use them," Bean said. "Now I can finally use them to build cabinets."

So, as the graduating seniors ramble around campus with that glaze over their eyes, droning the ritualistic, Sixth Sense-like chant of "I see reality," assure them that there is a bright, shining light ahead.

Religion plays big part in experiences

jennifer groskreutz



Associate Special Sections Editor

I wanted to attend a church-owned college when I went away to school, and I didn't want to live where it snows because I hate to be cold. So, I applied to BYU-Hawaii.

What I've learned throughout my BYU experience could not have been learned at any other college institution.

I spent my first semester at Orange Coast College (OCC), a junior college in Orange County, Calif.

Because I procrastinated turning in my application for BYU-H, the school was already full for fall. I couldn't attend until winter semester.

I'm glad I had the opportunity to attend a school not run by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, so I could compare the differences.

When I enrolled at OCC, I didn't sign an honor code, and I knew there were no special ideals and principles to abide by.

To some, that might sound like freedom.

However, after the first week of classes, I found myself wishing there were such honor codes and "rules" at OCC.

I didn't mind the "interesting" hair do's, beards and scantily-clad women as much as the filthy language and the smoking.

A few of my classes were night classes, which meant they lasted about three hours.

We often had 15-minute breaks to stretch, use the restroom or grab a snack.

Every single time I stepped outside of the classroom, at least one classmate, usually three or four, would already be smoking a cigarette. The smoke was prevalent around the classroom door, as were the abundant foul-language conversations.

Since I was taking 17 credits that fall, the semester ended almost as soon as it began. Next, I found myself at BYU-H ... paradise.

Not only was smoking on campus banned, but people actually wore clothes that covered their "private parts."

The experiences I had in Hawaii were irreplaceable and invaluable. Where else could one person be Primary president, Primary chorister and a CTR teacher all at once?

In addition, the first time I ever sat in the same room with a prophet was at BYU-H.

A plethora of people packed into the Canon Activities Center to hear President Gordon B. Hinckley speak.

I will never forget how it felt to have the Spirit fill my body from head to toe while I stood to sing, with several thousand other people, "We Thank Thee O God For a Prophet."

At OCC, I couldn't walk down the halls and ask students if they were going to do baptisms for the dead that night. But, at BYU-H, I could.

Aside from gaining intellectual and spiritual knowledge in Hawaii, I gained a cultural awareness which could not be learned from a book.

As an employee at the Polynesian Cultural Center, I discovered a lot about Polynesians simply by working with them. They are some of the happiest people I know.

Also, several of the people I lived with in the Hales (dorms) were Polynesian, so I was able to observe their customs, such as removing shoes before entering a home or dorm room.

The best part was eating Polynesian food at ward and stake activities.

It's no wonder why I came home, after my first six months there, with an extra nine pounds of fat on my body.

Coming from Hawaii's campus, with about 2,200 students, to Provo's campus, with an enrollment of about 32,000, I was hesitant that I would have similar experiences.

But I didn't need to worry.

Only this time, the experiences were added upon. I heard President Hinckley speak again. Not only did I hear him speak at Devotional, I stood ten feet away from him when he came up to NewsNet for a quick tour. I did not ever expect to be such a short distance away from a prophet.

And the cultural activities continue to flourish here with Devotionals by Living Legends and luaus, which students can participate in.

When I long for Kalua Pig and a Polynesian atmosphere, I can walk over to The Little Grass Shack and satisfy my appetites.

The Provo temple is not far away, so I can continue to go to the temple as frequently as possible.

One of the things I'll miss most about church schools is Devotional. There's nothing like a good spiritual message to lift you up and keep you going throughout the week. Devotionals were always a little perk in my schedule.

The religious part of my college education has become the forum for my most memoralbe experiences.

Those memories will last a lifetime and carry me through to the future where more experiences await.

Not all graduating seniors want to walk

By Ashlee Ainge

Some BYU students graduating this month are opting out of all the graduation hoopla.

Caps and gowns, announcements, family visitors and sitting for two hours in two different ceremonies doesn't sound like anything but more work to students who simply want to revel in the relief of being done.

"I'm done," said Summer Casillas, 23, from Arlington, Va., graduating in English. "I just don't care about anything else, and I just don't want to sit there."

Casillas, like many other students, said she doesn't see the point in the graduation ceremony.

She said she doesn't want to spend the money, doesn't want her family to feel like they have to fly out to see her five seconds of glory and she can think of many things that would be more fun.

Debbie Vanausadal, of BYU's Alumni House, said that each graduation ceremony lasts about two hours.

That's two hours for the individual college ceremonies, which will be on Thursday night, and two hours for the entire university's ceremony on Friday afternoon.

Graduation application fees are $15 per graduate and cap and gown rentals for bachelor 'ssstudents are $20.

Even though the graduation proceedings may be a hassle, some students participate for the sake of tradition, or for their parents.

"Why would I want to get up at eight o'clock in the morning and sit there? It doesn't sound fun for me, either. But it is a family thing, and it gives everyone adequate closure," said Melanie Stohlton, 22, from Provo, graduating in accounting.

Stohlton said that although graduating is nice, graduation isn't fun at all.

Reception time changed

To accomodate more seniors, reception will be one hour earlier

By Rob Rogers
rob@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Associate City Editor

BYU's 2000 graduating class, all 6,091 of them, have been personally invited to meet President Merrill J. Bateman.

The President's Reception, an annual event, is being held an hour earlier this year to accommodate as many graduates as possible, said Ron Clark of BYU Guest Relations and Public Affairs.

The two-hour event will happen next Friday at 8:30 a.m. in the Museum of Art.

In the past, graduates have not been able to attend the reception because specific college graduation ceremonies were taking place while the president was greeting grads and their families.

"We moved it back so they could get here earlier. We try to catch as many as we can," Clark said.

However, despite the time change, the Marriott School of Management's commencement ceremonies will be taking place near the same time as the President's Reception. The Marriott School also has a reception after their commencement for the graduates.

> "I'm really looking forward to going. I think they'll have food, and that's a plus."
> — Joel White, graduating senior majoring in English

"I'm upset, I'd like to go to both," said business major and graduating senior Lisa Smith.

The President's Reception is held for the benefit of both the university president and the graduates, Clark said.

"It's his opportunity to meet the students," he said. "It always goes over two hours."

Graduates usually bring their parents to the reception to meet with President Bateman.

"I didn't really care if I went or not, it was my mom and dad who really wanted go," said BYU graduate Randy Swain.

Students who have attended the reception said it was definitely worth the effort it took to get there.

"I snuck out of my (college's) ceremony after I walked so that me and my parents could get to the reception," graduate Lindsay Cox said. "It was a pretty cool thing."

Other students missed the reception entirely.

"I was kind of miffed that the two events were conflicting. I thought it would have been pretty cool to meet the president," graduate Jenny White said.

However whether students miss the reception or not, whether they are able to attend or not, is simply the luck of the draw.

"It's planned (this year) so that they can attend," Clark said.

"I'm really looking forward to going. I think they'll have food, and that's a plus," said graduating senior and English major Joel White.

Like Johnny Cash singing "Foulsom Prison Blues," most students are just happy to be graduating.

"I'm just glad to be finishing up. School was fun, a lot of fun, but it's good to be moving on," said graduating senior and English major Nate Steed. "Although, now I'm beginning to realize I can't just go out into the world and do English like an engineering major will be able to go out and do engineering."

The President's Reception is an event sponsored by the university's Public Relations and Guest Services Dept.

Ceremonies are prank-free

By John Gambee
gambee@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

People looking for graduation day pranks or ceremonial revelry better attend another school's graduation. Patch Adams' type hoopla just does not happen here.

"Our students know how to act," said Kate Andreason of BYU's Admissions and Records Department.

In his twenty years working with the graduation ceremony, Ron Bybee, BYU's academic scheduling officer, says he cannot recall anyone having to be removed from the ceremony or punished for misbehaving.

"The ceremony doesn't lend itself to any rowdiness or misbehavior," said Bybee, who also serves as the commencement processional chairman. "There is always a great spirit of celebration. The students are all pretty respectful of the brethren and invited guests that are here to speak to them."

Once in a while, a graduate will dress up his or her baby in a cap and gown and carry the baby with them as they walk through the processional, Bybee said.

"We think it is good to see them celebrate it as a family," Bybee said.

Wild stuff.

High school graduation was different.

"I remember one girl got mad and put ketchup all over inside her ex-boyfriends car," said Jason Baddell, 24, a junior majoring in business management from Dover, Delaware. "In other years, I heard of some streakers too."

But BYU is different.

Some people attribute the lack of mischief to student maturity. Others attribute it to the Honor Code or the lack of alcohol at BYU.

Maybe it is fear of repercussions.

"They'll charge you if your cap and gown are damaged," said Jenny Sorenson, a 1997 graduate in English.

While the caps and gowns have a label indicating that renters will be held liable for up to three times the cost of replacing the gown, those working to distribute the gowns are unaware of any problems.

Mary Bushman has worked at BYU's cap and gown service for six years. She said to her knowledge, BYU has never had to pay for damaged caps or gowns.

> "The ceremony doesn't lend itself to any rowdiness or misbehavior."
> — Ron Bybee, BYU's academic scheduling officer

"We might have four or five damaged out of 5000," she said.

The damaged gowns are sent back in a separate box. But so far, there haven't been too many missing or damaged, said Lori Oldroyd, supervisor of the cap and gown disbursement.

Oldroyd did say every couple of years a gown or cap will be returned in the mail from a past graduate.

The package will have a note saying the graduate's conscious got to him or her, and so he or she wanted to return the stolen gown, Oldroyd said.

Seniors pushed to graduate

Enrollment caps, job market affect graduation speed

By Brinton Wilkins
Brinton@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

An emphasis on graduating within four years and a growing job market are influencing the speed at which seniors graduate from BYU.

If the batch of students who are graduating this month hold true to form, they will further the trend toward reaching the goal of having students graduate within four years.

During the 1988-89 school year, those who earned all college credit at BYU — comprising 27 percent of the total BYU population — took 6.4 years to graduate, according to the 1998 "BYU Fact Book" compiled by the Office of Institutional Studies.

During 1992-93 the average for the same group of students dipped to 6.0 years but climbed back to 6.2 years during 1997-98.

Current statistics show that for those students who transfer to BYU with more than 32 credit hours — comprising 28 percent of the student body — take an average of 3.75 years at BYU to graduate.

Students who bring less than 32 credit hours or high school advanced placement credit with them — 45 percent of the population — spend an average of five years at BYU.

These numbers do not include the time spent by students who serve missions for The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

The downward trend is partly due to a conscious effort by the university to move students through their education, said Karen Evans, coordinator of open major advisement.

"I know we're putting more emphasis of spring and summer term attendance," she said. "The university is now requiring 120 hours instead of 128 to graduate."

Even with the average time spent at BYU decreasing, students are changing their majors two times as often as they were seven years ago.

In 1993-94 students cha... their majors an average ... times.

Prosek, 21, a senior from Springfield, Va., majoring in International Studies. "Originally, I was planning on getting a new car or going to Europe with some friends, but now I'm getting a husband."

Although some students plan how they are going to celebrate their graduation months in advance, for other students, celebrating their graduation is not a priority.

"I haven't really thought about how I'm going to celebrate," said Donnetta Allen, 22, a senior from Monument, Colo., majoring in public relations. "My family is coming up to visit me , so I think I'm just going to hang out with them."

Perhaps most students would like to celebrate their graduation with trips and new cars, yet many students say they cannot afford to celebrate their graduation in extravagant ways.

"All I'm doing to celebrate my graduation from college is throwing away my case of Top Ramen," said Jared Palmer, 24, a senior from Calgary, Canada majoring in chemistry.

As well as a lack of money, seniors also say a lack of time is preventing them from celebrating their graduation.

"All I have time to do before I move back to California is go to Senior Celebration," said Stacia Brown, 21, a senior from Corona, Calif., majoring in marketing communications.

With graduation just days away, many seniors are occupied with job hunting.

"Celebrating graduation isn't a big deal to me because I'm still looking for a job, and that is taking up a lot of my time," said Kimberly Barlow, 21, a senior from Corvallis, Ore., majoring in community health education. "Just graduating from BYU is going to be a big enough celebration for me."

Graduates can show thanks by giving back to university

By Joseph Lopez
Lopez@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Staff Writer

Graduates concentrating on how much they can make, may want to consider how much they can give.

Every student who comes to BYU is basically on a scholarship because 70 percent of tuition is subsidized, said Sarah Sandberg, president of the Student Alumni Network and recently elected executive vice president of BYUSA.

"We drink from wells we have not dug," she said.

Sandberg said that giving back to the university is a duty of those who graduate.

When students graduate from BYU, they are asked for a donation, she said.

They are also encouraged to donate annually to the university, Sandberg said.

However, money is not the only way to give back to the BYU, she said.

On March 31, the Alumni Association sponsored an event called Alumni Connections where students could talk to alumni from various professional fields, she said.

Students were able to get advice and ask questions about their majors, Sandberg said.

But it does cost money to run a university.

A successful example of contribution to the university was the Lighting the Way campaign.

The goal of the university was to raise $250 million in six years, according to the Lighting the Way Web site.

The goal was surpassed by $150 million and in less than six years, thanks to those who believed in BYU.

"The need for funds at the university goes on even after the Lighting the Way campaign," said Ron Taylor, manager of communications for the LDS Foundation, an organization that provides philanthropic support for the LDS Church's educational institutions, which is presided over by the presiding bishopric.

Students can give to specific projects and departments. Or they can give to the President's fund, and let the administration decide where the needs are greatest, Taylor said.

Alumni or anyone else could also create an endowment to provide a continuing source of funds to the university, he said.

The most preferred and the most common type of donation is cash, Taylor said.

However, "People can give anything they want to give," he said.

Tassels on graduation gowns have meaning egan Schreiber, 21, a senior Provo, majoring in family ry and genealogy, said her ge sent her a letter, explaining protocol for the ceremonies.

Allen, who works in the family, home and social science advisement center, said they send out letters because some do not know what is expected of them at graduation.

According to an academic costume history provided by the alumni's cap and gown office, American colleges and universities established a uniform dress code half a century ago.

Lori Oldroyd, supervisor for caps and gowns, said the caps and gowns are not as significant as the tassels are.

Oldroyd said tassels are always worn to the right in university graduations.

"You turn it in high school, but never again," she said.

The tassels also help show your academic status, she said.

"You always wear your highest degree with your regalia," she said.

Even if students were to go for another bachelor's degree after receiving a master's or doctorate, Oldroyd said they would never wear the bachelor tassel at graduation.

Masters and doctorate students receive colorful hoods, Oldroyd said. Meanwhile,the gowns are always black, she said.

Tesa Stephens, 20, a senior from Portland, Ore., majoring in English, said she likes wearing black because it is more dignified.

"Although everyone looks nicer in other colors," she said.

Oldroyd said students only wear their school colors for gowns in high school.

"All universities wear black," she said. "It's more professional."

Oldroyd said the gowns are roughly the same, but each has distinguishing features.

The satin colors inside the masters and doctorate hoods represent the school colors of the student, Oldroyd said.

She said the velvet outside the hoods represent the degree obtained.

Students receiving their masters wear gowns similar to the undergraduate gown, with fitted arms that come to a point, she said.

"The doctorate gown always has black velvet on the sleeves, around the neck and down the front," Oldroyd said.

NewsNet Sports Writer

Besides coaching a couple of back-to-back national champions, BYU men's gymnastics head coach Mako Sakamoto holds a couple of records himself.

Sakamoto, one of the nation's elite coaches, was a 1964 and 1972 Olympian and six-time national champion. With all of these accomplishments, Sakamoto has another lofty goal in mind — the Guinness Book of Records.

He doesn't want his name in the famous book for his gymnastic achievements. He is going for another record — the most push-ups...upside down. He does these handstand push-ups on top of the 6-foot-3 parallel bars, and has been known to raise and lower himself 140 consecutive times.

Almost as astonishing as the 140 push-ups is the fact that Sakamoto does them in his 52 year-old body, albeit many men in their 20s would like to have his washboard stomach and sinewy muscles.

In an article in USA Today on Sakamoto's unusual hobby, one of Sakamoto's top gymnasts, Guard Young, said he might be able to do 20.

"It hurts a lot," said Young, who just captured his second national championship on the vault and placed second in the all-around. "You're upside down. The blood rushes to your arms. They shake and ache."

One of his first gymnasts was Peter Vidmar, who became a team gold medalist and an all-around silver medalist in the 1984 Olympics. To help build the strength of this promising gymnast, Sakamoto would push Vidmar to match him in handstand push-ups.

"He would do 18-19; I would do 20-21," Sakamoto said. "I just kept going."

Sakamoto is now in his 13th year at BYU. He came here after 14 years of coaching experience at the club, national, international and collegiate levels.

Since arriving at BYU, he has led the Cougars to their best finishes ever in the last three years.

Sakamoto was born in Tokyo, but moved to Los Angeles as a child, where he began his gymnastics career. At age 16 he won a national championship.

One year later he returned home as the youngest at the 1964 Tokyo Olympic Games.

His team recently finished seventh at the NCAA Championships, including two national champions, Cortney Bramwell won his second national championship on the still rings and Guard Young won his second national championship on the vault.

With the end of the men's gymnastics program at BYU, Sakamoto won't be training national champions here any longer, but you just might find Sakamoto's name in the record books. Look under handstand push-ups.

Tracksters recuperate during finals

By Dave Whitley
Whitley@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Sports Writer

As the semester winds down and everything seems to come to a halt for the summer, the men's track team marches on.

But with the current plague of injuries striking the men, this march is more of a lumbering hobble than a gallant traipse.

Because of injuries and the more painful nuisance — finals week — only three athletes will be competing this week.

Hurdler Kyle Grossarth will be heading home to Tempe, Ariz., while John Hedengren and Trevor Pettingill will be in Walnut, Calif.

Hedengren was honored earlier in the week as a GTE Academic All-American for his 3.98 GPA as a chemical engineering major.

So why bail out during finals just for one meet?

"We would hope that they qualify for the NCAA (championships)," head coach Willard Hirschi said.

The NCAA Outdoor Track and Field National Championships kick off May 31 in Durham, N.C.

The Cougars have six meets remaining after this weekend — including next week's Robison Invitational held at BYU — and each competition is another valuable opportunity for an NCAA qualification.

Both Grossarth and Hedengren are currently provisionally qualified for the tournament, along with fellow Cougars Marc Chenn, Kenneth Andam and Jim Roberts.

This additional week off will give the team a much-needed breather.

Along with small, nagging injuries, there are already six men out for the remainder of the season.

Hirschi compared the onslaught of injuries to the case of Job in the Old Testament.

"The team is like Job with all of the physical afflictions – and I get all of the mental afflictions," Hirschi said.

But the injuries are not the only ailment.

"Many of the new people haven't stepped up, which has characterized teams in the past," Hirschi said.

But Hirschi has great confidence in his team and in the potential it holds now and in the near future in this his last season at the helm.

"If I was thinking about more championships and honors, I would not retire this year," Hirschi said.

"Next year's team should be even better."

But it didn't quite happen that way.

"The balls that went out of here today were legitimate, there weren't any cheap ones today," Law said.

Law said the team's goal from now to the end of the season is to win the regular conference title before the Mountain West tournament.

"The tough road series (New Mexico and San Diego) are out of the way. We just need to take care of business at home," Law said.

The Cougars are 22-18 overall and 10-6 in conference play.

BYU plays today at 2 p.m. and will wrap up the series Saturday at noon.

The games will be broadcast on 1400 AM.

Positive attitude propels Y runner far

BYU track and cross country runner Elizabeth Jackson participates in a meet last year. Jackson is the only BYU runner to be named All-American four times.

"You feel good, you feel good, you can do it," BYU distance runner Elizabeth Jackson repeats over and over in her mind as she pushes herself through a 5K.

"Your body will believe whatever your mind tells it," Jackson said.

Jackson has been telling herself she can do it ever since the eleventh grade when she gave up dancing after 13 years to run track with her friends.

And her body has responded.

No athlete in the history of BYU — man or woman — has ever been a four-time All-American cross country runner.

Until now.

But four-time All-American only tops the list of Jackson's talents and accomplishments.

"She's an all-American woman in more than one way," assistant track coach Patrick Shane said.

Jackson was awarded the Outstanding Senior Female Athlete Award based on her high athletic and academic performance and sportsmanship.

Shane described Jackson as an artist, musician, dancer, athlete and an outstanding student.

"She's just a well-rounded individual," he said.

Jackson is red-shirting during this outdoor track season, so she can improve her times in the steeple chase enough to qualify in the event next year.

The steeple chase is a 3K with five hurdle-like barriers spaced throughout each lap. After one of the barriers is a 10-foot-long pool that begins three feet deep and gradually angles out. It's not a race that many athletes enjoy running.

Except for Elizabeth Jackson.

"Right away I was like, 'I love this event,'" she said.

Jackson has the fastest time on U.S. record for the race.

Shane feels Jackson's ballet and dance training have given her the technique and coordination needed for this event.

"She dances over the barriers and through the water," Shane said. "She's an artist out there, performing."

The difficult decision Jackson made years ago to give up dance performance to develop her talents in running is one that she said she doesn't regret, for many reasons.

"In running I can get better and better, through practice and setting goals. I love to have that control," Jackson said. "It's so different from dancing where improvement was harder to measure."

A sense of accomplishment is just one of the benefits Jackson reaps from being a member of BYU's track team.

A large part of her love for running is the people she's had the opportunity to run and work with.

"I love the people I'm around, they are my best friends," Jackson said. "The girls are just real quality girls; they're hardworking, fun and genuine. We have a good time together."

Aside from their scheduled practices with the team on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, each athlete is responsible for running a set number of miles each week on their own or with other members of the team.

Jackson prefers running with a group.

"Running is just not very exciting unless your with a group and have something good to talk about," she said.

Jackson said that sometimes the women are laughing so hard they can't even run.

Shane considers Jackson to be one of the most talented athletes he has ever coached, and has enjoyed working with her for a number of reasons.

"She's fun loving, outgoing, friendly, spontaneous and funny, not to mention a good athlete," Shane said. "She brings out the best in everything, that's why everyone loves to be around her."

Jackson attributes her success to many people, her coach, Patrick Shane, her supportive parents and especially her teammates.

"I would be no where without my team," she said. "They are great examples, good friends, and just amazing girls."

Although she gets a great deal of support from friends and family, Jackson has decided that success in her sport will come solely from her desire.

"I don't think there are any distance runners that do it for the glory. It has to come from you, you have to just want it for yourself."

Jackson wants it for herself, so she will continue to repeat, "You feel good, you feel good, you can do it."

Knight has more to worry about than choking incide

Jim Litke
Associated Press Sports Writer

He has divided a community, defied the authorities, inspired protest rallies and forced high-ranking officials to do backflips over whether he should be allowed to stay.

No, this is not a story about Elian Gonzalez.

This one's about Bob Knight.

A video out this week on CNN-SI proves one more time that Knight wasn't exaggerating when he claimed to be in the business of molding young men. So it shouldn't come as a surprise to see him "molding" the windpipe of one of his players, believed to be former Indiana guard Neil Reed, during practice a few years ago.

Knight, after all, has done worse in the middle of games. He once kicked his own kid, Pat, whose only crime was taking up valuable space on the Hoosier bench.

There are times when defending Knight requires a shower afterward, and this is one of them. What he did to Reed was inexcusable; everything Knight said it would be, and more.

When first asked about it, on the eve of the NCAA tournament, Knight answered, "Maybe I grabbed Neil Reed by the shoulder, maybe I took him by the back of the neck, I don't know. I don't remember everything I've done in practice."

Turns out Knight is not the only one with a bad memory. The assistants who talked about their coach "guiding" players to spots on the court by grabbing a shoulder or a waist need a refresher course in anatomy.

But Reed's version, too, missed the mark, especially the part about other coaches having to separate Knight from him.

The bottom line?

There is nothing new here for the committee deciding Knight's future. He has been bullying everyone around him -- his own kid, kids who play for him, referees, opposing coaches, university administrators -- for years. The only thing that's changed is that now, clips of him raging out of control can be downloaded from the Internet.

Besides, nobody ever changes sides in this debate. Stories about Knight pile up in the newspapers and 500 people show up on the steps of Assembly Hall in Bloomington, Ind., to protest. Their gripe was not so m what was in the stories, was left out.

BYU women's golfer makes sport a family affair

By Camilla Scott
Camilla@newsroom.byu.edu
NewsNet Sports Writer

Golf — it's a family thing. At least for Carrie Summerhays.

Summerhays, a sophomore on the BYU women's golf team, can't remember life without golf.

Being the youngest of eight golfers, Summerhays said she did what her siblings did. She played in her first tournament at the age of five.

"I begged my mom to let me play," Summerhays said.

She shot 86 in nine holes.

Not bad.

Her young nieces and nephews all have plastic clubs. It's in their blood, beginning with Summerhays' dad, Bruce.

Bruce Summerhays has spent the last six years on the Senior Professional Golf Association Tour and during the summer, Carrie is his caddy.

"When I caddy for my dad, I learn," Summerhays said. "I pretty much learn from his mistakes because we're a lot alike."

When Summerhays sees something in the way he's handling the course, she will give him tips and sometimes they work she said.

Aside from Dad, Summerhays also has the opportunity to receive one-on-one help from other professionals on the Senior Tour.

"Most are willing to share with young talent that will listen," said BYU's head coach Gary Howard.

Summerhays listens, but not just with her ears. She goes out and applies their words of wisdom.

"You look and see what they do, and then you take the good things," Summerhays said.

Summerhays' father encourages her to ask for the professional tips.

On one tour, Bruce Summerhays told Carrie if she wanted help on her short game, to ask Lee Trevino. She took advantage of the professional environment and received the Trevino tutelage.

"She has a relationship with them," Howard said. "I know she's watching them and that is a learning experience in and of itself."

Summerhays said she would like to turn professional like her father and brother, Joseph.

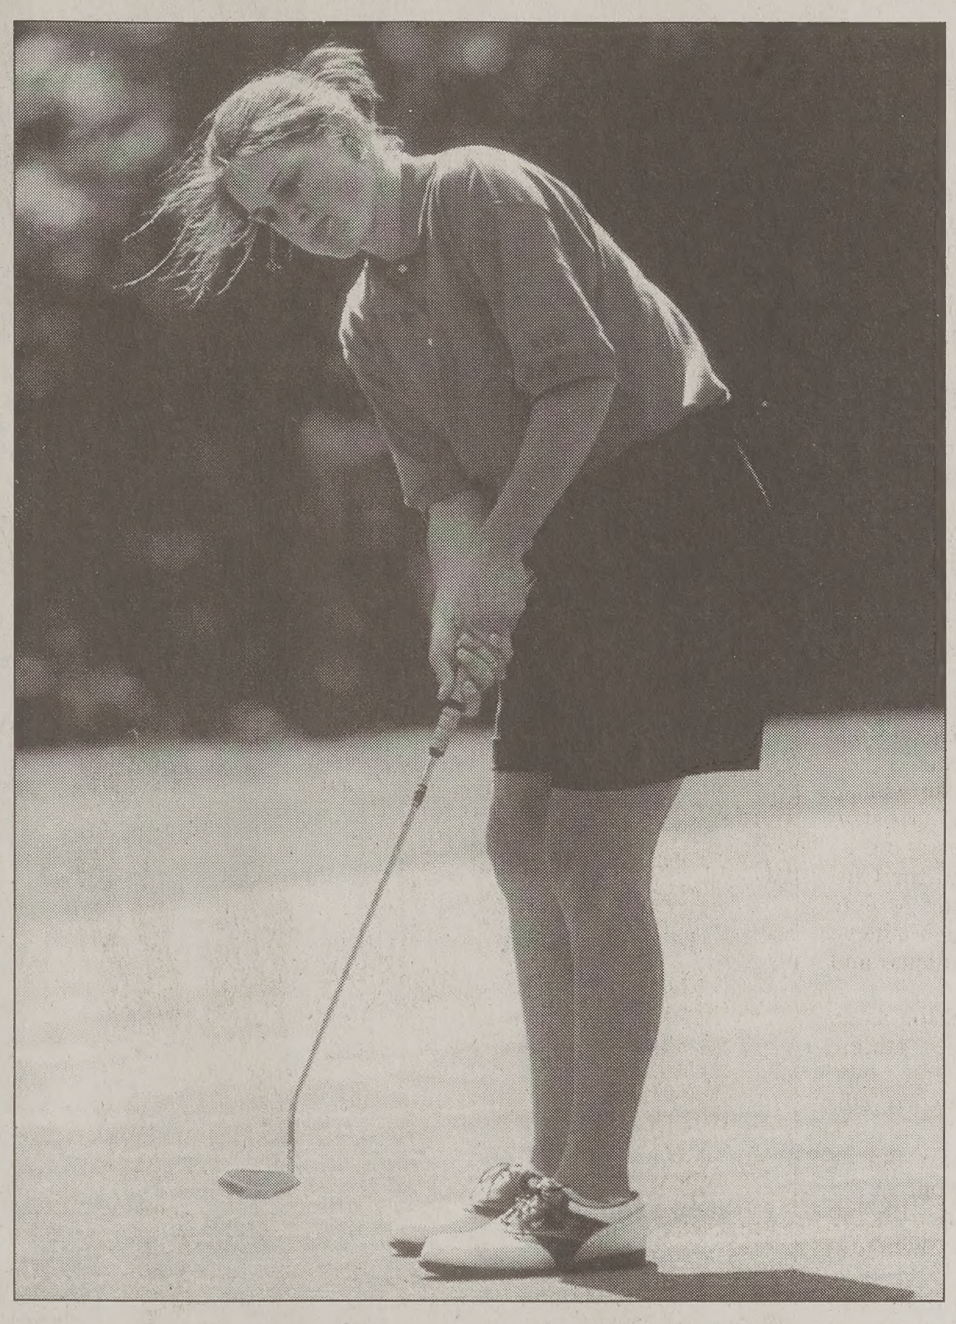
Howard said Summerhays has important elements to help her make it to the Tour. She's a good student of the game, she's motivated and has the desire to work he said.

"She can go about as far as she wants to go," Howard said.

As far as her BYU game goes, Summerhays has lead the Cougars in their tournaments this semester.

"She has the ability to make things happen when it needs to happen," Howard said.

This awarded Summerhays the McLeod USA Mountain West Conference Women's Golfer for the week of March 30 after her performance at the Lady Aztec Invitational.



Carrie Summerhays watches a putt in a tournament last season. Summerhays made the All-WAC First Team last season and was named MWC women's golfer of the week March 30.

A BYU softball player works out at a practice earlier this season. The Cougars will open a home series today against Utah.

By Amber Albrecht

NewsNet Sports Writer

After two months and 27 games, the BYU softball team will play its first home games in its history.

The Cougars will take on the University of Utah in a doubleheader Saturday at 1 p.m. at Harmon Field, located south of campus at 900 E. 250 South.

"We're excited to finally have a home game," outfielder Lindsay Hodgen said. "We're playing a rival team, and it's our first home game ever."

The games will also mark the first meeting between BYU head coach Mary Kay Amicone and her former team. Amicone was an assistant coach at Utah for seven seasons and also played second base for the Utes.

"We can all sense the rivalry," pitcher Maryon Dewitt said. "We know the background coach has but she's true blue."

Utah was the preseason favorite to finish first in the Mountain West Conference. The Utes come to Provo with a 5-3 MWC record, and are ranked third in MWC standings after Colorado State pulled off a surprise sweep of the Utes last weekend.

Utah is led by catcher Sunny Smith, who has started in every game this season to post a .370 batting average. Smith is one of the five regular players on the team who boasts an averages over .300.

The Cougars have been working on upping their offense this week to combat the Ute attack.

"We are focusing a lot on offense and looking to drive our hits," outfielder Emily Fernely said.

Sophomore outfielder Liz Smith leads the Cougar offense with an average of .301, while first baseman Mindy Hanson remains the RBI leader with 13.

Cougar outfielder Linday Hodgen is tied for the conference stolen base lead with Utah's Lisa Hashimoto-Hall with 16 stolen bases on the year.

"We expect to win, we always do," Hodgen said. "We know that we're very talented and we have what it takes to win."

"Utah is an established team, but we hope to have a big crowd and lots of support, and we don't have anything to lose."

TESTIMONIAL
(From a satisfied customer)

When I placed my ad in the Daily Universe I was worried about getting my apartments filled for S/S. To my surprise, ALL 12 spaces that were available for S/S PLUS F/W were filled in just 6 short days!

"I want to recommend The Daily Universe paper to everyone. They are indeed the best newspaper - to advertise in if you want your needs filled in a hurry."

Thank you again for your help, courtesy and the professional way in which you handled my ad for me. Mr. K.L.H.

Six hours a day.
Five days a week.
260 days a year.
For ten years.
That's how long
I've been training to get here.
It's been one of the hardest things in my life,
and the joy of my life.
I'm Chris Waddell,
alpine skier,
and my dream is to go to the Paralympics.
USA
Share the dream.
Volunteer for the 2002 Olympic and Paralympic
Winter Games.
Without the efforts of people like you, athletes like Chris would never make it to the Paralympic Winter Games.
Because there wouldn't be a Paralympic Winter Games.
Your help is that important.
